

Failure to bring perpetrators to justice leads to more violence

Academics tell international workshop

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

Amnesia and failure to bring the perpetrators of killings and repression to justice produce a feeling of resentment leading to more violence in the society, said academics and human rights activists at an international workshop yesterday.

The states in general document the history of such carnages from their own point of view for political purposes, while the individuals forget the memories as a vehicle to healing, they said.

The 3-day workshop on 'Memory and Amnesia in the South: How Societies Process Traumatic Memories of Violence and Conflict' began at the Brac Centre Inn in the city on Friday.

Experts from South Africa, Latin and Central America, the Philippines, the Netherlands, India, Pakistan, Cameroon and Bangladesh are attending the workshop.

Department of International Relations of Dhaka University (DU) and The South-South Exchange Programme for Research on the History of Development (SEPHIS) have jointly organised the workshop funded by The Netherlands Government.

DU Prof Sonia Nishat Amin presented a paper on 'Retrieving a body from the killing fields of 1971: the case of martyred intellectual Selina Parveen', while its student Ilira Dewan shared from her research on the refugee women of

Yves Alexandre Chouala of Yaounde University, Cameroon shared traumatic memories of post-Apartheid South Africa and post-genocide Rwanda, while Manolo EVELA Castaneda of Mexico on Guatemala, the memory of the perpetrators.

Meg Samuelson of Stellenbosch University, South Africa gave a presentation on memory, mourning and melancholia in post-colonial fiction from Mozambique, South Africa and Zimbabwe and Mario Ruler of Mexico on the traumas in the history of South Africa and Argentina.

Taking part in the discussion, Dr Hameeda Hossain of Ain O Shalish Kendra said in many occasions, the official memories of genocide of a nation are dictated by some determiners and used for different political or social purposes.

History of some individuals are recorded in delays while it is never documented in case of some others, the human rights activist said, adding: "Silence is honoured in many cases for political fear or family values."

Briefing on the issues, DU Prof Meghna Guhathakurata said when people cannot express the memory of genocide or repression in a legitimate way, it is expressed negatively.

Referring to the story of a Palestinian woman, she said failure in expressing her traumatic memory of the continuous violence in West Bank, she used to beather son on regular basis.

"This is true not only in case of individuals, but also of state," the DU professor said, adding that the liberation war itself was an expression of the Bangladeshis, but failure to bring the perpetrators of the genocide generated a insensibility to justice among the people of this country.

"Now it seems that the freedom of the country gained in 1971 is shrinking," Prof Meghna added.

Another DU Prof Amena Mohsin said the distinctions and divides between state and non-state, personal and public are not only being interrogated but also reinterpreted and redefined for genuine reasons.

To understand violence and its impact on societies and people it is important to probe into the similarities and dissimilarities between conflicts and violence, examine their structural and psychological causes and seek lessons from them.
