

Vow to resist acid attack

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

A unique rally was held at the Central Shaheed Minar in the city yesterday where teachers, lawyers, businessmen, journalists, artists, and students -- all of them are males -- made a vow to resist acid attacks and expressed their solidarity with the campaign against acid violence.

Victims of acid violence also attended the rally and narrated their plights through drama, recitation and songs.

The Acid Survivors Foundation (ASF) organised the rally to mark the International Women's Day.

Wearing white T-shirts and caps, carrying banners, festoons and placards and chanting slogans against acid violence, around 5,000 people converged on the Shaheed Minar and lit candles to raise social awareness.

Speakers at the rally called on the government to form a separate monitoring committee to keep the track of all criminal cases under the acid law.

The acid law came into effect in March 2002, but the retail sale of acid could not be contained as expected, they said.

Loopholes in investigations and the lack of coordination among the ministries concerned are creating obstacles to proper enforcement of the acid law, said Matiur Rahman, editor of the Prothom Alo.

Barrister Rokanuddin Mahmud said strict enforcement of the acid law and raising massive awareness are a must to curb acid violence.
