The unfair 'oborodh'

The photograph of the tired girl waiting at Zia International Airport for a ride home (The Daily Star, November 14) drives home the price people are paying for the madness of a few.

The action of the 14-party alliance led by the Awami League clearly shows that they consider Bangladesh as their fiefdom and the people of Bangladesh pawns in their game.

A party or an alliance that holds trade and commerce and rights of freedom hostage, burns buses and uproots railroad tracks and then claims that it is being done to protect our democratic rights has to be condemned.

With her children enjoying the safety and security of living in the USA, Sheikh Hasina could damn care about the plight of the children (or their parents) in the face of this blockade. When the political system does not favour them, the Awami League cries "fundamentalism" and resorts to an international smear campaign against Bangladesh abroad and demands intervention of the FBI. Yet, when they resort to violence and blockade, they never question their own actions.

Going by the constitution?

BNP and AL leaders are telling again and again that everything should be done according to the constitution. I agree with them but I have some questions as well. May I ask the leaders of the two parties: does our constitution allow corruption? I hope you have not forgotten that you have made this country world champion in corruption.

Disparity between rich and poor are widening day by day which is also against the constitution. Practically, there is no accountability of the top political leaders. They can produce godfathers, build houses in Malaysia or in other foreign countries with the money of the people; it is there choice whether anybody can bring his or her dying mother to a hospital in Dhaka and they can easily hire very efficient lawyers to protect themselves.

It is the constitution which they violate frequently.

Nolok Babu

I voted for Nolok Babu in last year's Closeup 1 contest on TV, for I truly liked his performance. He would be one of the gems of our society that's what I expected. However, I was dismayed at the fact that the same Nolok Babu and his friends beat up a man after hitting him with his car. This was not expected of him. We expected him to be more mature. However, Babu has already said sorry to the court. This incident should be an eye-opener for those who are celebrities and public figures.

We commoners may commit such offences, but they cannot. No, they absolutely cannot.

Our garment products in UK

In July last, I was preparing myself for my PhD viva examinations. My English supervisor told me to buy all new dresses for that event. I went to the renowned and expensive British departmental shop "Debenhams" in Nottingham. I purchased a new suit, one shirt with a tie and a pair of shoes. When I came to house I found that the shirt was made in Bangladesh. The price of that shirt was 15 pounds (around TK.21000). I was so happy that I could not explain it; other items were made in EU. I successfully defended my viva examinations wearing that Bangladeshi shirt with English suit. In the UK, I did not find any good Bangladeshi products except shirts. I found English people like Bangladeshi shirts very much though the price is not so cheap compared to Chinese shirts (in some cases just one pound!).

During that period our poor garment workers were agitating violently in different parts of Bangladesh. Probably they have lots of grievances. I think the price of one shirt is equal to a monthly salary of a deprived worker. I came to know from newspapers that certain quarters were trying to destroy our garment markets. If this is true, then we all should be very careful. On the other hand, our owners may do a little bit more for the deprived and very poor workers. Thanks to our industrious owners of garment factories and government officials who created this opportunity.

Now the caretaker government and also our politicians may take some initiative to save our garment industry.

A difficult situation

Although I am unable to support any of the political parties of our country due to their failure to think about the nation rather than their personal gains, I feel compelled to write this letter. Not because I feel that either one of our major political parties is right or better, but because I am having my most fundamental rights as a citizen of a democratic nation snatched away from me.

Having a partisan caretaker government and a partisan Election Commission takes away any possibility of a free and fair election. Even if the Awami League is resorting to mob justice, a form of justice, which can only be titled as revenge, I feel that it is impossible for them to come to a solution with the caretaker government and the Election Commission that are in place now.

Unfortunately, we Bangladeshis do not have the choice of electing a party, which will give us good governance. But what we must have the right for is choosing even between a rock and a hard place. If an election is not free and fair, it takes away that choice from us. If votes can be rigged, then the essential characteristic of a democracy, one man one vote, has been taken away from me.

It is, therefore, my opinion that no political party should participate in an election if it takes place under these partisan circumstances. I have heard many people who talk of freedom, rights and the good of the nation, saying that the Awami League should assent and come to a compromise. What they fail to understand is that there is no place for compromise. We may lose economic growth every day, we may be restrained in our homes every day, we may even have to watch people being beaten to death on television every day. And even though this should stop, participation in elections, unless the requisite conditions are created, will be the greatest failure of any political party, which cares about the nation. My right to have my vote count is the most essential right I have as a citizen of a democratic country. And to give in now, to compromise that right so as to have peace and economic growth along with a biased election, is not an option. It is better to shed blood to protect our right to choose who will govern us, than to have the right of choosing who will govern us taken away from us.

Pitfalls of CTG

Many politicians try to prove that the Caretaker Government system is an innovative political idea. But to me, the system seems to be a great setback to democracy in our country. This concept has come from political faithlessness. The system was introduced in 1996 through the 13th Amendment to our Constitution by then BNP government to survive the wrath of the mass people. People desired to practice authentic democracy after the ouster of the despotic regime of President Ershad. But unfortunately BNP shattered the dreams of the people through Magura by-election. Then main opposition party the Awami League could not trust the BNP and to ensure a free, fair and acceptable national election the AL waged a movement for caretaker government system. Though at first the BNP shrugged off the demand, ultimately it had to capitulate to public upsurge in 1996. Within only ten years the caretaker government system has polarised our political groups, politicised administration and aggravated political mistrust and vendetta. This system has not smoothened the path of democracy; rather it has massacred our political culture. All the political parties want to come to power by hook or by crook. Political acrimony has criminalised our society. Muscle power and black money play a pivotal role in national election. To ensure free, fair and flawless election, the Election Commission should be rejuvenated and rectified massively. It should be separated from the PMO. Voter ID card with photo and electronic voting machine should be introduced to prevent vote rigging. For this we can seek help from our neighboring country India. Many donor agencies are ready to help us, if we need funds for this. Special electoral laws should be enacted to bar recently retired bureaucrats and business tycoons from contesting in the national election.

The main political parties should sit together to nullify the system and reform the Election Commission, if they want to perpetuate democracy in our country. I hope the politicians will ponder over this matter.

Yunus' formula

Nobel laureate Dr. Muhammad Yunus advocated a 'coalition government' formula in his speech delivered at a civic reception at the Sangsad Bhaban premises organised by the Dhaka City Corporation. In his speech he suggested a concept of coalition government where the two biggest rival parties in Bangladesh would form government by mutual understanding and compromise. The proposal is obviously good but not a practical one in anyway. Actually, immediately after I had heard the proposal I did not have to think twice before forming my personal opinion about the inefficacy of his suggestions (I beg his pardon if I am too critical about this). Actually, the idea of a coalition government is not new in our country and people in this country are quite familiar with this concept, because our country has been practically divided into two alliances (broadly marking secularists and non-secularists). So, I have nothing to say against the concept of 'coalition govt'. But what seems to me quite absurd in the proposal of Dr Yunus is his invitation to the two arch rivals, AL and BNP, to mingle and form a 'consensus govt'. It is worth mentioning that the main leaders of the two parties do not even talk to each other. (They do not want to see each other's face). Professor Yunus himself could perceive the superficiality of his formula as he latter told in his speech in the Press Club that his formula could be a utopia indeed.

Pertinent questions

We have accepted Dr. Iajuddin Ahmed, who had become president with the support of a political party, as the Chief Advisor (CA) and also gave him time to prove his neutrality. Then why we failed to accept Justice KM Hasan as CA and failed to give him time to prove his neutrality? Now the million-dollar question is: would the situation in the country become much worse if Justice KM Hasan were to become the CA? Who are suffering during the hartals and blockades? It is we the helpless, wretched people, and not our so-called patriotic political leaders. In fact, they are having a good time.

Our national leaders thought and hoped in the past that our present political leaders would try their best to bring smile on the face of 'Dukhi Bangla'. But these political leaders are doing just the opposite. They are playing with the country as well as with its people. They think Bangladesh is their Ancestral Property and we are their most obedient servants. They will do whatever they like and we will obey them.

I again request the 140 million people of Bangladesh NOT to run blindly after the symbols of Sheaf of Paddy and Boat.

Please think about the development and welfare of our beloved country and its people.

Our moral values

As conscious citizens we are all aware that our moral values in general and respect for the righteousness in particular have fallen to its lowest level in recent times. Their students, because of their unprincipled and insincere commitment towards their pursuit, do not respect teachers. Politicians are rightly accused of not being truthful. Elders are not respected because of their questionable activities. Users of the road driving a taxi, bus, car, rickshaw, etc, do not respect the law as the law enforcers can be easily stoned at or purchased. Respect is a word getting rare by the day and regrettably everyone of us in our respective vocations is responsible for this decay.

There was a time when a house in a locality was pointed out with a lot of admiration and envy for having a son who had got his bachelor's degree. That was a time when honesty and humility was respected and practiced. Today a house is pointed out with a lot of endorsement for a son who is a powerful "mastaan", and who has easy access to the secretariat or to the ministers. Such is the level of our moral value these days.

The other day a reporter asked ex-President Ershad his views on being termed a "Bishawa Behaya". Many applauded the guts of this young reporter forgetting that the reporter was crossing the thin line of etiquette and decency of journalism. They almost forgot the disrespect that has gradually developed in the young minds for elders. This was being telecast to millions inside and outside the country. It would have been a different case if the reporter had asked a movie star or a businessmen; the reporter was talking to none other than the ex-president of this country, who we may or may not like, ruled this nation of ours as our president for nearly a decade.

The question is not Ershad, or why he did not have the spine to ask the reporter to rephrase the question like many other world leaders do, what matters was the insubordination and the disrespect shown which is now too often seen in the relationship between teacher-student, father-son, traffic police and traffic rule breakers, employer-employee, you name it, in every aspect of our lives.

The electronic media, especially the TV channels have become powerful during the recent times and seems to have taken the role of national motivators. Our moral values can be brought up to its glorious levels of the past through the media simply by the manner they present their shows. I am sure I vent the common feelings of many of your readers when I plead to the media to be a little more careful in publishing gruesome pictures of mutilated bodies due to injury. Similarly, the need to raise the moral values is required to be hammered repeatedly by the media so that it is driven home in every aspect of our daily life. Let us join hands to rebuild our long lost moral values inch by inch from scratch which is very much needed at this point of time.

Security providers

We have recently seen a rise in the number of security companies and those who are running these companies say they are in the field to complement and supplement the government's law enforcing mechanism. This certainly is a good initiative both in terms of new business as well as ensuring the security of the people. This, however, also proves that the government's law enforcing authorities cannot ensure the security of the people. Doesn't it also mean that the government machinery would fail to identify any breach of law or crime committed by these security companies? Certainly, because no one would at all suspect these companies. They work in a field full of criminals and, therefore, getting allured to that world is not unlikely. It's worthwhile to mention that a few dreadful robberies in Dhaka city were allegedly committed with the complicity of the personnel belonging to these security companies.

Therefore, the questions are: does anyone oversee the operations of these companies? Does anyone keep any track of their operations whether they themselves are getting involved in any crime? What do people do if they discover these companies committing crimes?

We wonder what happened to the regulation that the government was formulating for administering and controlling the security companies. In doing so, the government should better remember whether our society really needs these security companies.

Why this trouble?

The whole nation is experiencing a lot of trouble under the non-party caretaker government. Troubles started long before handing over of the state power to caretaker government by the BNP-led alliance under justice KM Hasan who, according to constitution, ought to be the chief adviser of the caretaker government. The then ruling BNP wanted to see him in that position but the AL-led 14-party combine stood against him raising their voice about his impartiality. Standing against each other the two major political parties of the country- BNP and Awami League-- created a lot of trouble which caused the general people to suffer immensely. Finally, when the protest against his holding the office of chief adviser of caretaker government got intense, Justice KM Hasan agreed not to hold the office of CA. Afterwards, CEC Justice MA Aziz also had to go on a three-month leave facing the protest from not only a few numbers of political parties but also the majority of people.

But the problems that we are facing as a nation have not been solved. Kshitish Chandra Milan
Asst. Teacher, Bogra YMCA Public School, Bogra

The biggest favour that the two major parties can do to the nation is that they can refrain from taking part in the next elections. This could well be their first and last opportunity to offer something to the nation. Otherwise, the frustrated population will reject them for good.

The Anti Corruption Commission can start functioning, the judiciary can become independent, law enforcing bodies should become corruption free, businesses can run less unethically.

Let us organise a movement asking them to excuse the nation at least for the next five years.

We all know that basically politicians, as policy makers, are supposed to concentrate on the magnitude of the current national problems and issues of common public interest, foresee the need of the future and formulate short-term and long-term policies to cater to the needs of the present and future for the welfare of the people. In real life, our politicians are not involved in fulfillment of their constitutional obligations, election pledges etc. Serious inconsistency we notice if we analyze the demand of our political parties and their activities. It happens all the way that the party in opposition puts tremendous pressure on the party in power; whereas, after having the power in hand that party, in most cases, does not go by their commitments.

The situation must change. Now, the most crucial question is "where to start?"
