

Nato-Afghan operation kills 30 Taliban

AFP, Kandahar

A military operation in which a British soldier died in Afghanistan at the weekend left about 30 Taliban fighters dead, Afghan police said yesterday.

The British forces, however, could not confirm the rebel toll but said "possibly a significant number" were killed in the fighting in the Kajaki district of the southern province of Helmand that started Saturday.

"In the two-day operation 30 Taliban were killed and another 20 were wounded," Helmand police chief Mohammad Nabi Mullahkhail told AFP. He said the operation concluded Sunday.

said.

Lieutenant Colonel Rory Bruce of the British task force in Helmand said there were no other casualties to the troops beside the death, the first this year among the roughly 40,000 foreign soldiers in Afghanistan.

"A number of Taliban were killed in the course of the action, but we don't know how many ... possibly a significant number," he told AFP.

A purported Taliban spokesman, Mohammad Yousuf Ahmadi, said only three fighters were killed and eight wounded.

The hardliners routinely understate their own casualties while exaggerating those of the Afghan or foreign militaries, the main targets in an insurgency launched after the Taliban were forced out of government in 2001.

Death tolls in clashes between security forces and rebels in Afghanistan's dragging insurgency are usually impossible to verify, with various sides giving different accounts including over whether civilians are killed.

Around 4,000 British troops are based in Helmand, one of the most volatile provinces in Afghanistan and where some areas fall outside of government control.

Helmand produces most of the country's opium crop -- which makes up 90 percent of the world supply -- and the narco-trade is said to feed the insurgency, which was its deadliest last year.

Hindus swarm to Ganges to wash away sins

AFP, Allahabad

Tens of thousands of Hindu devotees plunged joyfully into the frigid Ganges river yesterday to cleanse away their sins on an auspicious day at a huge religious festival in northern India.

Braving near-zero temperatures, the pilgrims swarmed into the sacred waters in Allahabad at the confluence of the revered Ganges and the Yamuna rivers for the Ardh Kumbh Mela, one of the largest gatherings of humanity on earth.

Sunday and Monday, two of the 45-day festival's six auspicious bathing days, mark Makar Sankranti, the transition of the sun into the tropic of Capricorn.

"This river is enchanting. You cannot stop. I dip into the water and it's a top-of-the-world feeling," said Mahendra Verma, a building contractor who was standing shivering in his underpants.

"At first one feels cold, but the feeling vanishes with one dip." Pilgrims began bathing in the murky river waters early Sunday, hoping to break the endless cycle of reincarnation.

"Tens of thousands have already started taking baths (Sunday). In next two days over five million devotees are expected to take baths," said festival organiser P.N. Mishra.

Mishra said about 2.5 million pilgrims had already taken a dip since the festival began January 3.

Another bather, Kusma Devi, in her early sixties, said she had walked almost 25 kilometres from her village to reach Allahabad, some 400 kilometres from the Indian capital New Delhi.
