

Soovas Dutt: Undying passion for filmmaking

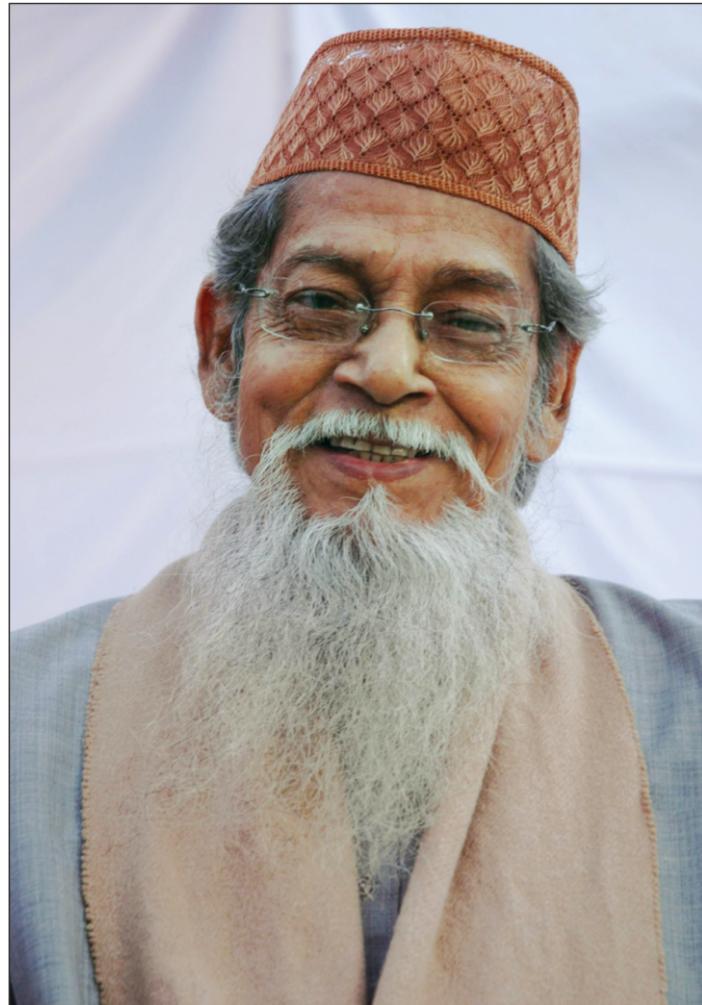

AHSAN HABIB

ANY account of Bangladeshi film history will not be complete without mentioning Soovas Dutt. He is one of those who have remained active in our film industry ever since its inception. He has made a good number of films that contributed greatly to the golden era of Bangla cinema. In a recent interview with The Daily Star, the veteran filmmaker talked about his entry into the industry.

Dutt started his career in the film industry as a commercial artist working in film publicity. He did the publicity for Mukh o Mukhosh, the first Bangla film made in the then East Pakistan. He designed the logo, poster and the title of the film. His publicity works for several Bangla and Urdu films earned him fame. Though the publicity job was an important aspect of his involvement with the industry, it was never enough. "There had always been creative impulses and inspirations, otherwise I would not be able to come so far."

In 1957, he had the opportunity to watch Satyajit Ray's Pather Panchali. "I was greatly moved by the film. Though I had been involved in the industry for quite sometime then, it was a whole new experience for me. I wondered if Ray, also a commercial artist, could make such a film, why can't I? There's no harm in trying." This conviction led him to prepare himself for greater achievements. He started going to libraries and cultural centres including British Council and USIS as they had good collections of books on films and filmmaking.

After attaining considerable theoretical knowledge, he longed to put it to test. As no film institute was there, he had to rely solely on working in films. He requested S M

Parvez, the editor of Chitrali, who was directing Matir Pahar, to allow him access to the sets so he could practically learn the art of filmmaking. Parvez invited him to assist Hassan, the Indian art director of the film. "It was an amazing thing for me to get an access to the Film Development Corporation (FDC)."

Dutt never thought of becoming a film actor. The young aspirant director offered his service as an assistant to Ehtesham who was directing Ei Desh Tomar Amar. Ehtesham offered him a role of a comedian in the film. And when the film was released, the new comedian became very popular. He acted in quite a few films including hits like Rajdhani Bukey and Chanda before he came up with his first directorial venture in 1964. By the end of 1962, he decided not to "waste" his time in acting. "I could realise then I was going in a wrong direction. I am here to make films. I questioned myself where I was heading," he recalls the crucial period of his life.

Dutt's entry as a director is also quite remarkable. He made his first film Sutorang with a tragic end. "A lot of my acquaintances told me that people won't like a tragic film from a comedian," Soovas says. He can vividly recall the day when the film was released. Ehtesham accompanied Dutt to the Mazaar at High Court premises. They offered munajaat and spent the day in anxiety. The film was a huge commercial success and won an award at the South Asian film Festival in Frankfurt.

Dutt is a follower of Swami Vivekananda, "I have tried throughout my life to implement Swami's philosophies."

Dutt has directed 25 films so far. According to him he has distanced himself from the industry as "bad elements" have taken over. However, he is not pessimistic about the future, as he believes it to be a 'temporary' phenomenon.

Amazing lines and colours in viscosity Kalidas' workshop on printmaking ends

FAYZA HAQ

Sounds of dhol and shankh heralded the conclusion of Kalidas Karmakar's print workshop at Alliance Francaise Dhaka. The Japanese ambassador, Masaaki Inoue, was the chief guest at the occasion. The products of the fortnight's progress were on display on the walls.

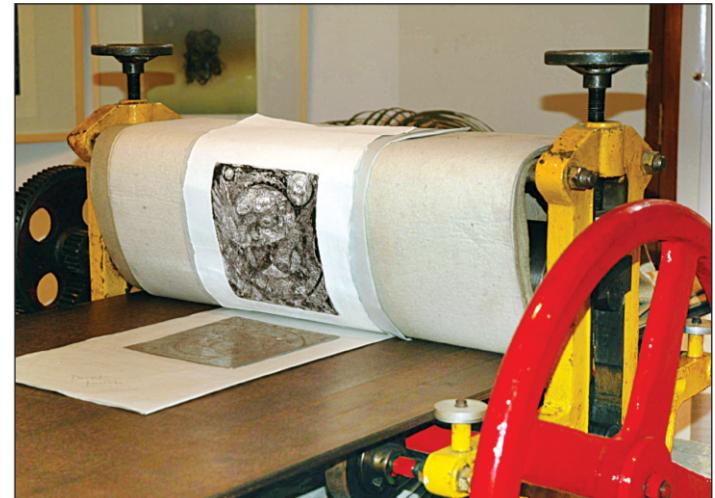

Rashid Amin, a well-known printmaker, had participated at the workshop. He says, "It was wonderful to learn from Kalidas. I did abstract images in black, red and brown to show how one can experiment with the same plate."

Nazia Andaleeb displayed her work -- dry point, etching and viscosity -- inspired by the techniques taught by Kalidas. One of her works is abstract and deals with impressions of a face. Next there is a female face along with figures of animals, with lines, and sketches and the last print has a female figure that has been turned into a lotus. "At the workshop I learnt printmaking -- in which a lot of lines are used -- which I'm sure will help my career," says Andaleeb. "I hope to combine oil painting with print in future."

Tariq Zauftikar, another upcoming artist, says, "The viscosity technique is something that helps one make colourful work at one go. My subjects deal with escape from prevailing social problems. One has two elfin-like figures speeding in different directions and playing the horn. A dancing man, done in red, orange and green, comes in the next print. Floating figures are featured in his last print while bars of green and yellow brighten the image."

A print by Proshanto Karmakar shows Buddha meditating, placed on a giant lotus. Birds are included in the same composition. "The entire world needs to meditate, such is the prevailing situation today," says Proshanto. Green and orange dominate his work. The dove of peace has been brought in another creation and here too the artist has harmony in mind. Nagarbashi Barman, another artist, has brought in fish, nets, harpoons, boats and the sea in his work. Dry point and etching have been used in his black and white and sepia works.

Qamruzzaman's print brings in drawings of worms, owls, vultures and human bodies that appear to be stitched at the back. "I bring in not-so-pleasant images to reflect the topsy-turvy political situation in the country," the young artist says, "I've brought in the nude figure too as I believe that's how nature intended man to be." He has worked in dry point and viscosity.

Imran Ali in his prints tries to reflect his belief that humans have evolved physically but so much mentally. He has created figures within figures, one intermingling with another, in his effort to depict evolution of man.

Afroza Sultana depicts a conglomeration of dragonflies; insects that she has been fascinated with since childhood. This is in dry point and in black and white. Her other image features masks, which Afroza believes is an integral part of our culture. Works by Sadia, another aspiring artist, deals with the bourgeois women's hang-up with beautiful garments and jewelry.

Abul Barq Alvi, professor at the Institute of Fine Arts DU, commenting on the prints, says that the work, done in a brief period proves that the young artists can do well, given needed motivation and guidance. Hashem Khan, acclaimed artist too had high praises for the workshop.

HSBC launches second volume of 'Shotoborsho Bangla Gaan'

KARIM WAHEED

To celebrate the last 100 years of Bangla music, the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation Ltd (HSBC) in Bangladesh held a musical soiree at Bangladesh-China Friendship Conference Centre, Dhaka in February 2006. The colossal event was attended by who's who in the social and cultural scene. Encouraged by the massive response from music enthusiasts in the country and to preserve the songs presented at that event, HSBC recorded the performances in three CDs. The collection titled Shotoborsho Bangla Gaan was launched in May, last year.

This year in February, HSBC organised another musical soiree on a grander scale (also titled Shotoborsho Bangla Gaan), a continuation to last year's initiative. Featuring 42 songs back-to-back by A-listed artistes including Shahriar Rahmatullah, Sabina Yasmin, Mitali Mukharji, Rezvana Chowdhury Bonna, Mita Haque, Syed Abdul Hadi, Samina Chowdhury, Bashir Ahmed, Ram Kanai Das and several others, the evening pulled in around 1200 music lovers. Channel i will air the programme in May.

On April 11, HSBC launched the second volume of Shotoborsho Bangla Gaan at Bay's Galleria. The Album is collection of 4 CDs and includes all 42 songs performed at the programme held in February 2007.

At the album launch, Mustafizur R Khan, head of Marketing and Public Relations, HSBC Bangladesh said, "Recording live performances while ensuring the quality of sound is challenging; the credit goes to Tanvir Alam (sound engineer) and Bengal Music Company Ltd for technical assistance."

MD Mahbub-ur-Rahman, corporate banking head of HSBC, hoped that music enthusiasts would enjoy reliving the golden era of Bangla music.

Steve Banner, CEO of HSBC Bangladesh said, "HSBC is committed to promote the local culture and heritage. The Shotoborsho Bangla Gaan concerts and albums are part of that initiative."

Dr Karunamaya Goswami, noted researcher and music exponent said, "History records the evolution of music in this part of the world goes back 1,100 years but the last century in particular is the most significant period in our music. Kudos to HSBC for organising these impressive programmes and bringing out albums featuring classic Bangla songs. Hopefully their endeavours will continue in bigger and better ways."

According to HSBC, while the limited edition album will not be available for sale, complimentary copies will be made available to customers who take out new personal instalment loans between April 15 and May 30, 2007.

Movie watch 'The Hoax': True story of a fake story

The literary and journalistic frauds of the present era are small potatoes compared to the work of Clifford Irving. Irving, back in the early 1970s, conned a major publishing house and a popular magazine. He told them that Howard Hughes -- the words "reclusive billionaire" were not actually part of the man's name back then -- had appointed Irving to be his official biographer. Claiming to be in regular contact with his subject, and forging handwritten letters to back up his claim, Irving pocketed a large advance and produced a manuscript apparently spun out of a mix of careful research, inspired guesswork and pure invention.

All these years later, even as Hughes' mystique has faded somewhat, the audacity of Irving's stunt still has the power to astonish. Lasse Hallstrom's briskly entertaining new film, The Hoax, proposes a few intriguing hypotheses.

The most obvious answer is that the scam was born out of desperation. Irving, impersonated with hungry, nervous intelligence by a roughed-up, curly-haired Richard Gere, starts out as an ambitious writer who has just seen his big break evaporate. The novel that was going to make his reputation has been summarily killed by the publisher.

The Hoax project is an outrageous bluff that is also, in an odd way, Irving's last shot. His sidekick in the enterprise is a nervous, nebbish researcher named Dick Suskind (Alfred Molina), who is, at first glance, everything Irving is not. Uxorious, clumsy and a terrible liar, he is both Irving's reality check and his enabler. And the brilliance of Gere's performance is that he makes the audience believe in Irving without believing a word out of his mouth.

The Hoax, with an excellent script by William Wheeler, achieves a similar complexity of tone.

It is for the most part a jumpy, suspenseful caper, full of narrow escapes, improbable reversals and complicated intrigue.
