

Ensure accountability of admin involved in electoral process

Speakers tell roundtable

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

Politicians and members of civil society at a roundtable yesterday welcomed the draft reform proposals of the Election Commission (EC) on electoral laws, but strongly recommended measures ensuring accountability and transparency of civil and police administration involved in electoral process.

They said officials of police and civil administration involved in electoral process should submit their wealth statements, as politicians or their parties have the scope for poll rigging with their assistance.

The roundtable titled 'Reform proposals: Present thoughts' was organised by Shushashoner Janney Nagorik (Shujon) at the National Press Club in the city.

The speakers also suggested immediate dialogue with the political parties and civil society members for some additions and omissions in reform proposals.

"I welcome the provision for registration of political parties, but there should be check and balance of power in the EC so that the political parties do not become weak," said Jatiya Party leader GM Quader while talking to journalists on the sideline of the roundtable.

"There might be different types of problems if the EC is given much power," he added.

GM Quader said, "The political parties adopt irregularities with the help of the police and civil administration. This must be stopped. There is however no such proposal in the draft."

He said if congenial environment is created, a candidate even does not need to spend Tk 5 lakh for election publicity.

Registration of political parties will help bring financial transparency with regard to politicians, but the declaration of wealth statements by the deputy commissioners, officers-in-charge and police superintendents, who assist the electoral process, should also be made mandatory, said Awami League (AL) leader Dr Abdur Razzak.

He said stringent laws could be formulated to regulate the student fronts of political parties, but other front organisations should be there, at least for decentralisation of political power.

Justice Qazi Ebadul Haque said the EC should make it mandatory that only those parties, which will not have any front organisations, will be eligible for registration.

"The professional bodies will be organised only for professional causes," he said, adding that front organisations of the professional bodies highly politicise the administration and thus divide the nation.

"At present, the student organisations are nothing but sources of extortion and power," he added.

Shujon Secretary Dr Badiul Alam Majumder in his keynote presentation proposed publication of all information about the candidates as soon as the EC gets them.

He regretted that the EC had proposed nothing for bringing it out of the control of the Prime Minister's Office and making it financially independent.

Dr Alam proposed for electoral tribunals with retired judges for speedy disposal of electoral disputes saying that it is not possible to impose timeline on the High Court for disposal of cases of such nature.

The EC has also not proposed any measures for stopping the use of muscle and money power in the election, he said, adding that the EC should supervise printing of election posters and organise the projection meetings with continuous monitoring of the expenditures of candidates and political parties.

Dr Alam proposed that the political parties should operate all financial transactions through bank accounts and publish the audited accounts annually.

To resist nomination business, the primary members of political parties should play their due role, he noted.

"We should encourage independent and neutral candidates, as most voters support the major political parties for vested interests," the Shujon chief added.

Former adviser to caretaker government ASM Shahjahan suggested measures for instant punishment to law enforcers and other officials who will violate electoral rules.

Demanding mobile courts in such cases, M Hamid, a cultural personality, said the whole activities of the elected representatives should be well defined so that they cannot abuse political power for personal gains.

AL leader Abul Mai Abdul Muhit alleged that the EC is killing time for reforming the electoral laws.

This is the other name of delaying the election, he added.

"A non-elected government, whatever popularity it may have, is liable to act on its own will," he said.

Brotee Chief Executive Officer Sharmeen Murshid said the EC should also think about the elections of local government bodies while reforming electoral laws.

Columnists Syed Abul Maksud and AZM Abdul Ali, Air Vice Marshal (ret'd) AG Mahmud, Dr Zafarullah Chowdhury of Gonoshasthitha Kendra, Barrister Harunur Rashid and Journalist Rafiqul Haque Sarker also spoke at the roundtable moderated by former adviser to caretaker government M Hafizuddin Khan.

Working in shifts shortens life span

Says study

UNB, New Delhi

Working in shifts throughout the day instead of a normal day job could shorten your life span, a study has found.

A study of 3,912 day workers and 4,623 shift workers of the South Eastern Central Railway in Nagpur showed the former lived 3.94 years longer than their counterparts on shift duties, said the study by Atanu Kumar Pati of the School of Life Sciences in Pandit Ravishankar Shukla University, Raipur.

"Though the study was conducted on railway employees, it can also be applied to workers in other sectors, including the BPO industry," said Pati from Raipur according to a report run by PTI on Sunday.

Shift work affects the circadian rhythm, the 24-hour cycle in the physiological processes of humans that leads to several sleep-related and social problems.

Circadian rhythms are important in determining the sleeping and feeding patterns of all animals, including humans. Brain wave activity, hormone production, cell regeneration and other biological activities are linked to this daily cycle.

Pati and his colleague K Venu Achari analysed a database of dates of death, retirement and death of each worker and published their findings in the latest issue of "Current Science".

They also studied data on deaths due to all causes of 594 railway employees, including 282 day workers and 312 shift workers, over a span of 25 years. The cause of death was not documented in the database.

An analysis of the data showed that day workers tend to live 3.94 years longer than counterparts working in shifts.

All day workers performed duty between 9:00am and 6:00pm with an hour-long lunch break at 1:00pm and included those on office job and doing miscellaneous duties, the study said.

Those coming for shift duties worked in a rotating system consisting of a day shift (8:00am to 4:00pm), first night (4:00pm to midnight) and second night (midnight to 8:00am).

They worked in each shift continuously for six days and had a single day break before resumption of the next shift.

The shift workers included running staff, gangmen and those doing miscellaneous jobs.

"The longevity of each worker was computed from the dates of birth, retirement and death," Pati said.

The researchers cited a number of animal studies that documented the life-shortening effects of weekly shifting of light-dark cycles.

It has been argued that these effects could be mediated through disruption of the circadian rhythm. Lighting schedule manipulation has also been reported to produce detrimental effects on the lifespan of insects.
