Colombo sealed off

AFP, Colombo

Police and security forces sealed off Sri Lanka's capital on Saturday, searching every vehicle entering and leaving the city amid fears of a Tamil Tiger attack, officials said.

There were huge traffic jams at every entry point to Colombo with motorists spending several hours before they could be allowed in. Doctors and others essential services were also stuck at roadblocks.

"This is part of the operations to prevent Tigers getting into the city," a police official said, adding no arrests were made during the three-hour operation.

The extraordinary security measure came as Sri Lankans prepared to watch their team play Australia in the finals of cricket World Cup in Barbados later on Saturday.

The latest moves followed heightened security in the capital after defence ministry reports that Tamil Tiger guerrillas had entered the air space of the island's only international airport overnight on Thursday.

The sky over the Kaunakakai international airport near Colombo -- where government warplanes share a runway with civilian jets -- was lit up with anti-aircraft gunfire in response to the incursion by a "suspicious aircraft."

Electricity to the capital was switched off so potential targets would not be illuminated.

The rebel Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), who have been fighting the government for 35 years and run a mini-state in the north of the island, bombed the Kaunakakai air base a month ago in their first ever air strike.

The separatists staged a second air raid on the Palaly military complex in the north early on Tuesday.

The following day the Tigers held their fire while Sri Lanka beat New Zealand to qualify for Saturday's finals.

us that they can complete the work by tomorrow. There is only a lack of an elevator in the grandstand but we are trying hard to set it up before the first one-day match. There will be no electronic scoreboard as National Sports Council (NSC) failed to install it but there will be a giant screen," said Shaheen, also head of the venue's supervision committee.

The progress of the renovation work only got into pace after Sports Adviser Tapan Chowdhury expressed his dissatisfaction during a surprised visit two weeks back.

At Stamford Bridge, Bolton grabbed the lead after the Chelsea back four made a hash of dealing with a 19th-minute corner, the ball falling to Lubomir Michalik, who lashed it home from close range.

The champions were level inside three minutes, Salomon Kalou heading in a Wayne Bridge cross, and went ahead when Kalou's header ricocheted off the bar, a Bolton defender and finally goalkeeper Jussi Jaaskelainen before ending up in the back of the net.

Bolton refused to give up the fight however and, nine minutes after the interval, Kevin Davies grabbed an equaliser with a close-range header and Sam Allardyce's side held out for a draw under the inevitable late barrage from Jose Mourinho's men.

A job well done

ADAM PARORE

I suspect the door is about to close on John Bracewell's career as the Black Caps coach. Bracewell, whose contract is up, has done a reasonably good job.

But the trend in sport is to operate on four-year cycles, based around World Cups. There would need to be a compelling reason to break with that and Bracewell just hasn't achieved enough to warrant a second term.

I've always hoped that John Wright would get his chance at some stage and from conversations with him many years ago; he has had his eye on the Black Caps' job.

Whether the time is right for him is another matter, but he is a popular bloke who would be a players' coach. And he has shown with India that he has the ability, and can handle the pressure.

Don't expect an appointment out of left field because New Zealand are sure to rely on a tried and trusted candidate from the professional coaching ranks.

Justin Vaughan, the incoming New Zealand Cricket chief executive, will set clear ground rules around the coaching issue.

New Zealand cricket is so lucky to have someone of Vaughan's calibre prepared to take over. He is very intelligent and considered.

He has also operated in sophisticated environments. He will have bigger fish to fry down the line so I just hope NZC can make full use of his talents in whatever time he is there.

* I can't see Sri Lanka upsetting Australia in the World Cup final.

Australia have probably been the best side at this long tournament, and their players are in such good form.

Their batters will sit on Muttiah Muralidaran and Lasith Malinga, and attack the others, believing this will provide them with enough runs.

If any side has the goods to beat Australia then it is the Sri Lankans, but they don't look to have enough overall batting firepower.

Shaun Tait looks Sri Lanka's best bet as an Aussie bowler to attack. The wheels could come off with Tait if he is attacked in the right places.

This match will be the farewell for the great Glenn McGrath, who was someone I always enjoyed locking horns with. He never made it fun for opponents out there, which is what makes the game fun.

He seems to have been around forever -- he was playing before I was. I don't think you will see careers as long as his any more because the schedules are so hectic. There are only so many games you can play before bits of the body start falling off.

He was so competitive. (The author is the former New Zealand wicketkeeper and wrote this one for the New Zealand Herald)

Barbados as well. This is where I took my first five-for (five wickets in an innings) in international cricket.

"To me a perfect way to finish would be with another five-for, a win, walk off and happy days."

McGrath, who grew up on his family's farm in rural New South Wales before moving to Sydney, said there was no secret to his remorseless accuracy.

"The less complicated you make things, the less things can go wrong. If you can bowl 99 balls out of 100, hitting the deck and the top of off-stump, you'll take wickets.

"When I've given that advice, I'm sure people have walked away disappointed. But it's worked well for me over the last 12 or 14 years."

And Sri Lanka captain Mahela Jayawardene vouched for its effectiveness.

"It's always a challenge facing him because he's always asking questions, not just me, probably any other batsman in the world would say this," said Jayawardene.

Asked about the batsmen he most admired, McGrath singled out Brian Lara, the former West Indies captain who also retired at the World Cup, and India's Sachin Tendulkar.

"The two standouts are Brian and Sachin. I feel Brian was probably in front of Sachin when they were both at their peak."

As for fast bowlers, McGrath nominated West Indies' Curtly Ambrose and Pakistan left-arm great Wasim Akram.

"They were two guys I really looked up to. Ambrose, the way he hit the deck when he really wanted to crank it up and Akram, what he could do with the ball both new and old and the way he just powered through the crease, both those guys were amazing bowlers."

However, Australia captain Ricky Ponting said McGrath's class was undeniable as well.

"There's no doubt we are going to miss him. He's one of the all-time greats and what he's been able to do for Australian cricket over such a long period of time is unbelievable. I don't mind saying I shed a tear at the SCG after he'd played his last Test."

And with the final also marking John Buchanan's last match as Australia coach before his retirement, Ponting added: "There are lots of good memories.

"Hopefully, there's another great memory we can take from this game and give both Glenn and John the appropriate send-off."

Malik assured of player backing

Desperate to move on after a horrendous World Cup campaign, Pakistan's new cricket captain Shoaib Malik said the players are ready to adjust with a new coach although they would miss Bob Woolmer.

"Obviously, Bob was with us for more than three years and he has left a void. But we have to move on and the players can adjust with any new coach that the Pakistan board appoints for the team," Malik told reporters after Pakistan's week-long camp for the three-match series against Sri Lanka got underway in Lahore.

Woolmer died on March 18 in Kingston, Jamaica, a day after Pakistan were beaten by Ireland and bundled out of the World Cup in the first round.

Woolmer's death remains a mystery and police in Jamaica are still trying to unravel the causes and circumstances surrounding his murder.

The former England player and South Africa coach was attached with the Pakistan team from mid-2004 till his death.

The Pakistan board has advertised the post for a national team coach and set May 15 as the deadline for submission of applications.

Malik said the players would extend full cooperation with the new coach whenever he was appointed.

"We are also looking forward to working with the baseball coach the board is planning to appoint to work on our fielding," he said.

Malik also rubbished reports that senior batsman Younis Khan and fast bowler Shoaib Akhtar had declined to join the camp as a part of their non-cooperation with him.

four wickets in four balls which almost added another dent to South Africa's brittle confidence.

Matthew Hayden, meanwhile, crowned his comeback from the one-day wilderness by smashing virtually every attack to the four corners of the Caribbean, a performance which brought him the world record for the fastest ever century.

And then there was Ireland and their sensational win over Pakistan which proved, if only temporarily, that minnows, at least some of them, did belong in the World Cup.

But their good work was undone by the embarrassing maulings handed out to Bermuda, Scotland and the Netherlands.

Bangladesh's young team made India look like... well, Bangladesh...with a win that sent Rahul Dravid's men home after the first round.

Many of that Bangladesh team will only be in their mid-20s by the time the next World Cup rolls around.

So what about a world title for the Tigers on home turf? Now that would be worth turning up for.

The reluctant coach

The day Tom Moody retired as a player he was asked about a possible switch to the coaching ranks. It was the easiest question he got all day. "No," he replied without equivocation. "That is a tack I won't be taking."

Moody, the former West Australian all-rounder who played eight Tests and 41 one-dayers, moved into a property development job at Multiplex after his retirement six years ago and was happy to let cricket life fade into the sunset. Suggesting to him then he would one day coach Sri Lanka in a World Cup final against Australia would have been as absurd as predicting he would be the first cricketer to land on Pluto.

"When you retire as a player you have had enough," Moody said on Friday. "I had mentally switched off from the game. The thought of coaching was the last thing on my mind."

"It was time for me to move on and be challenged somewhere else. A year later got a call from Middlesex and the adrenalin got going. Worcester rang me soon after and I agreed to join them and haven't looked back. I had my hunger and passion back."

Tonight Moody could become a cricketing oddity, the first man to win World Cups for two nations, as a player for Australia in 1987 and '99 and as coach of Sri Lanka.

Although he will not confirm it, Moody is expected to announce soon after the cup he will return to his native Perth and coach the Western Warriors in next season's Pura Cup, for the whisper is he is tiring of life on the road.

While Moody did not initially see himself as a coach, others did because of his shrewd, sensible and inquisitive nature. He is a natural leader. Australian players who played in the 1999 World Cup still believe he made one of pivotal calls of the tournament by quietly persuading captain Steve Waugh to drop an alcohol ban that caused deep divisions within the team.

What initially sounded like a good idea to make players focus on their cricket after a faltering start soon turned sour. While other players were whispering in protest behind cupped hands, Moody, hearing the dissent, subtly approached Waugh and suggested he let players have a few social drinks, particularly over dinner.

The captain relented and almost from that point the campaign turned around.

Coaching Sri Lanka has flushed out all sorts of emotions in Moody; patience to cope with a complex political environment, the loneliness of long periods away from wife Helen and two children who go to school in England, and admiration for players who have risen from humble, uncoached environments to stare down some of the game's toughest rivals.

As the son of a private school headmaster in Perth, Moody was well-educated and wanted for little in life. He clearly appreciates players who have had less comfortable rides.

A favourite is Sri Lanka opening batsman Upul Tharanga, who learned his cricket in the dusty back streets of Ambalangoda on the island's west coast. His family lost their home and all their possessions in the 2005 tsunami, yet somehow Tharanga has ploughed through the setback to score six international centuries, aged just 22.

"He hasn't had it easy... there are no state-of-the-art bowling machines where he learnt his cricket," Moody said.

"He came into the side 18 months ago from nowhere. He had a couple of technical things, in that he got into poor position for balls outside off-stump. He was vulnerable but in between that vulnerability there was some pretty special shots. We knew there was a special talent there."

"The Sri Lankans are quick learners and are unsopit. They have not had a lot of coaching and are self-made in that they have watched their peers and go out and play in the park on the beach or in the village. That's how they adapt their skills."

When Moody decided to devote two years to winning the World Cup with Sri Lanka, he promised himself there would be no half measures.

In January he made a private scouting mission to the Caribbean, preparing a mental dossier on everything from wickets, to dressing rooms, hotels and transport.

It is always difficult to quantify what imprint a coach leaves on a side but Moody's is more tangible because he has achieved one priceless plus: he has toughened up the side away from home.

He looked at figures that noted how the great Muttiah Muralidaran was bowling an obscenely high percentage of overs at home on almost unnaturally square-turning decks and decided Sri Lanka was living in an artificial paradise at home that would never translate to success abroad.

So fast bowlers were toughened up mentally and physically, the pressure was taken off Muralidaran and the team drew offshore Test series with England and New Zealand. The temptation was to try to rush the changes through but Moody felt this would not have been the Sri Lankan way.

"Australians are quite unique in that they are forever the optimists. They go for it and, if they fall over, they will then think about it and say maybe they should not have gone too hard. The Sri Lankans are more of a thinking group. They will think about it, analyse it and then go for it," Moody said.

"Australians like the go-for-broke philosophy but you would fall over yourself if you tried that with Sri Lanka because it is not the way they are."

Team insiders say Moody has worked because he has been sensitive enough to realise the different needs of each man. Muralidaran may be a self-made star but Moody challenges him with ideas about bowling angles and field placements because he is a thinking cricketer and insatiable chatterbox about the game who likes to be stimulated.

Lasith Malinga, the fast bowler with the magical round-arm slinging action, looks like a man you could throw the textbook at but Moody deliberately will not touch him because he feels to tinker with his gifts could destroy him.

Moody's stint has given him affection for the team and its country although he feels that driving in Colombo could make him a menace to society when he leaves Sri Lanka.

"Whenever I do finish up I will seriously have to pull the reins in as a driver. If you don't go with the flow of the traffic -- chaotic is not a strong enough word, it is absolutely crazy -- you end up in an accident or going nowhere," Moody said. "You have to drive in a reckless, irresponsible way. It is the only way you get from A to B."

"There is no such thing as road rage because everyone is prepared to break the rules."
