Ensure sustainable agriculture to reduce poverty

Speakers tell seminar

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

The government should ensure rural development through sustainable agriculture in the country to halve the level of poverty by 2015, speakers at a seminar said yesterday.

Saarc Agricultural Centre (SAC) organised the seminar titled 'Rural development for sustainable agriculture' at Bangladesh Agricultural Research Council in the city.

Presenting the keynote paper, Director General of the CIRDAP Dr Durga P Paudyal stressed the need to strengthen rural infrastructure and greater market connectivity for agricultural products of the country.

Lamenting that policymakers have showed some sort of negligence towards the agricultural sector since independence, he said agro-based industries should be the main destination of foreign aid.

He also called for promotion of the use of technology among the farmers in order to boost productivity in the agricultural sector.

Although the Saarc nations have set Saarc Development Goals to be achieved by 2012, very little has been done to meet the target, Dr Durga said.

He also suggested devising country-specific policies and programmes for each country.

Identifying centralisation of power as one of the major obstacles to rural development, he suggested that the sooner the decentralisation would take place, the faster would be the pace of rural development.

SAC Director Dr Wais Kabir said that although the contribution of agriculture to gross domestic product is decreasing day by day, the sector has always contributed to poverty alleviation.

Apart from traditional agriculture, forestry and fisheries can largely contribute to poverty alleviation and sustainable agriculture, he said.

Emphasising greater investment in this sector, he said that a thriving agricultural sector would ensure food security and bring in foreign currency as well.

The rights of indigenous people are being violated in various ways and the women are more vulnerable to exploitation as their right to security is also threatened, speakers at seminar said yesterday.

Demanding steps to protect the rights of indigenous women, they also criticised the previous governments for not observing the International Indigenous People's Day at the national level and not giving constitutional recognition to the indigenous people.

Since the United Nations has been observing the day for the last 13 years, Bangladesh, being its member state, could not neglect any international issues, they added.

Sampriti Mancha organised the seminar titled 'Rights of indigenous and minority women' at the National Press Club ahead of the International Indigenous People's Day to be observed on August 9.

Chaitali Tripura presented the keynote paper at the seminar presided over by Prof Ajoy Roy of Dhaka University.

"Indigenous women are severely affected by the acquisition of lands. The displaced women usually move to urban areas where they are also exploited in various ways," said Prof Sadeka Halim.

The speakers said the land allocation system should be gender sensitive.

They also called for inclusion of indigenous women issues in the Women Development Policy.

President of Bangladesh Indigenous Peoples' Forum Sanjeeb Drono said some reserved seats for women in parliament should be set aside for indigenous women.
