'Displaced children face rejection from community'

Children and women rescued from trafficking or hazardous jobs face huge challenges to get integrated with their families and societies due to the lack of a supportive environment.

Speakers said this at a workshop on 'Social Integration of Children Withdrawn from Sexual Exploitation, Worst Form of Child Labour and Trafficking' at LGED Bhaban in the city on Thursday.

The workshop was organised jointly by the Ministry of Women and Children Affairs (MWCA) and Unicef, says a press release.

John Frederick, international expert on social reintegration, facilitated the workshop, which explored various options and alternative ways of implementing social reintegration.

The speakers at the workshop raised concerns about the limited understanding of the concept of social integration and said that many children do not wish to return to their families and communities as the family members and the society often reject them.

In the concluding session, Joint Secretary Mushfeka Iklfat reiterated the government's commitment to the issue and said, "The government is open and keen to address this issue with care, openness and a realistic vision for the interest of the children."

A set of programmatic interventions and guidelines were developed for evolving a minimum standard of social reintegration in Bangladesh for children withdrawn from commercial sexual abuse, worst forms of child labour and trafficking.
