BBC executive resigns over queen's crown affair

AFP, London

A BBC television executive resigned yesterday over a documentary which wrongly implied Queen Elizabeth II stormed out of a photo shoot with celebrity photographer Annie Leibovitz after a row over her crown.

Peter Fincham, who was controller of the main BBC1 channel, stepped down after an independent inquiry released Friday criticised "misjudgements, poor practice and ineffective systems" at Britain's public broadcaster.

Stephen Lambert, head of production company RDI, which made the documentary, also resigned.

The resignations come after a number of recent high-profile admissions from the BBC, its main commercial rival ITV and other broadcasters of faking viewer phone-in competitions or other parts of TV or radio programmes.

Fincham announced at a press launch on July 11 that the piece, "A Year With The Queen", would show the 81-year-old monarch storming out of the shoot after a row over whether or not she should remove her crown.

Fincham, who had described the scenes with Leibovitz as "a very memorable little sequence", had learned that the story was untrue within hours, but did not correct it until the following day.

The BBC later apologised after admitting that the sequence of events had been "misrepresented", creating the false impression that the queen had halted the photo shoot.

A British teenager appeared in court yesterday charged with plotting to blow up members of the far-right British National Party.

The 17-year-old, who cannot be identified because of his age but has dual nationality with Pakistan, faces two charges under the Terrorism Act 2000 -- possession of material "for terrorist purposes" as well as collecting or having "information useful in the preparation of an act of terrorism".

He was released on conditional bail ahead of a hearing on October 25 to decide whether to send the case to a higher court.

A second 17-year-old has already appeared in court on similar charges and was remanded into custody.
