Record Russian arms sales in 2007: Dy PM

AFP, Moscow

Russian arms exports were worth a record seven billion dollars (5.5 billion euros) this year, Russian Deputy Prime Minister Sergei Ivanov said Monday.

"Since 2000 our arms exports have nearly doubled and in 2006 we hit the record sum of 6.5 billion dollars. This year we have a good chance of passing the seven-billion-dollar mark," the Ria Novosti news agency quoted Ivanov as saying.

"These figures confirm Russia's dominant position among arms exporters," Ivanov said.

According to the head of the federal service for military technical cooperation, Mikhail Dmitriyev, the biggest sellers during the year were the Sukhoi and MiG fighter jets, Mi helicopters and T-90 tanks.

"The companies that produce the S-300 and Pechora anti-aircraft missiles have orders up to 2012 which indicates their popularity," he said.

Uncertainty looms large over Duta election

DU CORRESPONDENT

Uncertainty looms large over the election of Dhaka University Teachers' Association (Duta) scheduled for December 31, as no teachers agreed to act as election commissioner.

Duta has so far requested several teachers to conduct the election, but all of them refused. Two of them initially agreed but later declined to act as election commissioner.

Sources said some members of Duta executive committee at a meeting proposed the names of several teachers, including Prof Imamul Haq, Prof ABM Faruque and Prof Anwar Hossain, but the committee did not approach them to conduct the election to the executive committee for 2008.

The Duta election has never been deferred in the past. According to the constitution of the association, election of the executive committee for one-year term must be held by December 31.

The election has become an important issue in the wake of arrest of four teachers and a number of students.

Several teachers said that if the election is not held on schedule, the efforts to release the teachers and students would be hampered.

Prof AAMS Arefin Siddique, former president of Duta, said there is a deliberate attempt to delay holding the elections.

On November 24, the Duta executive committee fixed December 30 as the date for the election, but the general members had not been informed, he said, adding that the election was later rescheduled for December 31.

If the election is not held on schedule, the association should convene a general meeting to decide whether the present committee will continue after the expiry of its tenure or any ad hoc committee will be formed for the period up to the next election, he said.

But the date of the general meeting is yet to be fixed.

Duta Acting President Prof Tazmeri SA Islam said they are now thinking of convening a general meeting to discuss the issue, as the executive committee is yet to select an election commissioner.

"The next general meeting will select an election commissioner. But we cannot convene the meeting due to Eid and winter vacation. However, the general meeting must be held before December 31," she added.

She also denied the allegation that pro-BNP and -Jamaat White Panel does not want the election to be held on schedule.

Anxious wife and a happy ending

September 15 by unidentified armed militants.

"After 81 days of my abduction, a commander of the abductors came to the room, where I was kept captive, on December 7. He hugged me and said I was to be released immediately. I couldn't believe him completely. But when I saw that no arrangement for cooking was made that evening in the mud hut, I thought may be I would really be released," Noor told The Daily Star.

Instructed by the abductors, Noor shaved his moustache and took a shower. His captors then blindfolded him tightly again. "Held by two armed men, I walked for about an hour and a half. As we stopped, they took off the shawl I was wearing and the blindfold too."

"One of the captors said: Go, there is a car waiting for you. That was the most dangerous moment for me during the whole period of my captivity, because I was in between two groups. I didn't know who were the people waiting by the car and if they were ready to shoot me dead. I walked fast for about 20 yards and saw the silhouettes of four men with guns on the horizon. It was 7:32pm on my watch. They put me in an SUV. As the thing began to roll, one of the armed guys said they were security personnel of the Afghan state. I was then sure of my release."

The Afghan security men took Noor to the security chief of Logar Province.

"Once I arrived in Logar, I prayed to Allah expressing my gratitude and phoned my wife. I asked her to inform people about my release. She was very happy, I could feel her joy over the phone. She asked me to say 41 rakats of naphal [optional] prayers, and kept her request."

The next day, the security men took Noor Islam to the chief of Afghan security in Kabul, 65 miles from Logar. "The security chief asked me, to whom I wanted to be handed over, I said to Brac Afghanistan's Country Director Gunendra Roy. Gunendra came after some time and received me. I was sent home on December 13," Noor said with an ear to ear grin shining like the soothing sun of that winter morning.

Noor's wife Anwara also told The Daily Star about her harrowing uncertain days between the abduction and the release of her husband. On September 16, the day after Noor's abduction, a Brac official, Abul Kalam Azad, called her on the mobile phone from Jessore asking her how she was doing and saying he wanted to visit her.

"I was at my sister's in Faridpur that day. I immediately called my sister-in-law at my in-law's in Jamia asking her to take care of the officer when he would visit. I was however thinking, there must have been something wrong, because the officer had never called me before," Anwara said.

Anwara then sent an SMS to Noor Islam in Afghanistan, but there was no reply. "I was sad, because he had never been late in replying before. I sent another message, but again didn't get any reply."

Running out of patience, she called Abul Kalam Azad asking him if there was anything wrong. Azad said her husband did not return to his residence from his office in Afghanistan the day before. "I don't even want to remember what happened next," she paused for a long time.

Brought back to the reality by another question, Anwara, mother of a five-year old boy Arian, went on again, "I could neither eat nor sleep since his abduction. Whenever I tried to eat something, I felt like throwing up. I had to be under constant medication."

"I survived a month only on saline solution. Slowly, I tried to become stronger by praying. After a month of the abduction, the wife of a Brac official informed me that my husband was still alive and that his picture had been shown on television. I asked a journalist if that was true, he collected the picture and gave it to me."

Soon, Anwara dove into the efforts to release her husband. "I went to Brac in Dhaka. They said they were trying. I went to the foreign ministry seeking their help. The foreign adviser said he was trying hard for my husband's release. I said, please try again, bring back my husband."

Once a Brac official phoned her saying that the foreign minister of Afghanistan asked them to assure her that her husband would return home soon. A cabinet minister of that country also made a similar assurance, Anwara said adding, "I then became hopeful of his return."

Anwara said during the three-month of her husband's captivity in the hands of unknown Afghan militants, there were always people around her to take care of her and her son. "I am usually very caring of my son, as he is a bit autistic, but during that time I didn't even feel like taking care of him. I became completely numb, devoid of any aspiration to live. I was praying to Allah for my death before hearing anymore bad news about my husband," she said.

Finally on December 7 when Anwara received a phone call from Noor Islam saying that he had been released, she first could not even trust her own ears and then was swooned.

"Nothing had ever been more joyous than that piece of news," Anwara said adding, "I want to start everything anew. I have been reborn."

Noor Islam said the foreign adviser called him after he had arrived home and told him, "You have a very good person for a wife! You are lucky! You should give her special thanks." Noor replied, "I already have."

Taslima welcome in Bengal but Centre must ensure security

Says Jyoti Basu

PRESS TRUST OF INDIA, Kolkata

Towing a slightly different line, Marxist patriarch Jyoti Basu on Tuesday said controversial Bangladeshi writer Taslima Nasreen can return here if she chooses to, but the Centre will have to ensure her security.

"If she wants to return to Kolkata or elsewhere in West Bengal, she is welcome. But the Centre will have to ensure her security," he told reporters after a felicitation programme at his Salt Lake residence.

This is the first CPI(M) leader to speak in sympathetic tone for the exiled writer ever since trouble broke out in Kolkata last month over her writings with a number of leaders having adopted a rather cold attitude on her return to the city.

Recalling that he had met Nasreen earlier on several occasions, Basu said, "I read in the newspapers that she is very disappointed about having to stay outside Kolkata. Now let us see what the Centres say."

Stating that he had read Nasreen's book Dwikhandito, which sparked off violence in the city last month, the former West Bengal chief minister said, "The state government has already banned the book. What she has written there about the Prophet Mohammad and the Koran cannot be accepted by any Muslim."

Basu, however, was also critical of those who indulged in the violence last month after which she was whisked away to Jaipur, the Rajsthan House in Delhi and then to an undisclosed location in the national capital.

"Those who indulge in such violence are the ones who will be closest to God if they kill people," he said.

Lauding External Affairs Minister Pranab Mukherjee for his statement in Parliament on the Taslima Nasreen issue, he said, "The External Affairs Minister has given a good speech."
