

The judges however proved far more revealing, with QM Shahed pleased to announce that they were contributing towards "national interests with competitions like this." The head of HR, revelled in what he said was "a very rewarding experience, although the content may not always have been as prolific as the presentations themselves."

Reputed media personality Samia Zaman and CPD Research Fellow Fahmida Khatun bringing up the trio.

And to further the transparency card, it was made sure that the judges did not know which teams were participating so as to ensure an impartial result.

And fair it was, with Khulna the deserved winners, describing their feelings as "simply wow!"

"This is a good message to the people of the country. The decentralization of business (and other) education is a good thing. We at Khulna University have proved it beyond any doubt," they said after the initial reaction had simmered down a tad.

"The standard of education we are used to is quite high," they said dispelling the myth that Dhaka is the be-all and end-all of tertiary education in the country.

"Our students were confident and we believed from the off that we could win this thing," was muttered amidst hurried phone calls to friends and faculty members.

But the real eye-opener from the champs was when they said that they were used to tougher competition at home then they had faced at BoM.

"The culture of our education there (in Khulna) entails us to make presentations whenever.
