

Photo shows wolf replicas called "Head On" at the Guggenheim Museum in New York. Works by Chinese-born artist Cai Guo-Qiang are taking over New York's Guggenheim Museum, transforming the building's iconic rotunda with exploding cars and flying wolves.The retrospective is the museum's first for a Chinese artist and was described by the museum's director, Thomas Krens, as "one of the most, if not the most ambitious physical installations that we've ever done." The most startling work of the exhibition is Cai's "Inopportune: Stage One," made up of nine cars filled with light tubes that give the impression of being frames from a movie of a car exploding upwards through the central atrium.

Buddhist novices walk to collect alms and offerings in Yangon. Myanmar ruling junta said that the country will hold a referendum on a new constitution in May promising to then have multi-party elections in 2010. The announcement on state television came amid mounting international pressure on Myanmar over its bloody crackdown on pro-democracy demonstrations in September, when the United Nations estimates at least 31 people were killed.

A quote on the First Amendment by former US Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall is displayed as work continues at the Newseum, a 250,000 square-foot museum dedicated to news, during a tour in Washington, DC. Set to open April 11, the Newseum includes 15 theaters, 14 galleries, two state-of-the-art broadcast studios and a 4-D time-travel experience.

Indian Dabbawallas or lunch-box deliverymen, attend a laughter therapy session to beat stress in Mumbai. More than 200,000 tiffin boxes are delivered by a team of nearly 5,000 carriers daily across Mumbai, India's financial capital. The tiffin carriers and their efficient system which has ensured the delivery of hot meals every day without fail for the past century has attracted the interest of top management consultants. The lunch runners face stress of meeting sharp deadlines while traversing across the city in packed local suburban trains.

AFP PHOTO