CPD ON PROPOSED BUDGET Budget investment friendly, populist

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

Any instability in the political climate and disturbances in transition to democracy will bring in major challenges for implementation of the proposed budget, the Centre for Policy Dialogue (CPD) observed in a post budget analysis yesterday.

The private policy research think-tank said according to its expenditure allocation the budget may be called a 'pro-people welfare budget', but implementation of it will be difficult with the existing poor capacities of the government.

"Budget implementation will be difficult without proper transition to democracy," CPD Executive Director Prof Mustafizur Rahman said during a post budget analysis news briefing at Brac Inn Centre in the capital, which was telecast live on private TV Channel.

"Maintaining macroeconomic stability for smooth transition of power to a newly elected government during the first six months of the next fiscal will be a major challenge," he said.

CPD also suggested middle of the course review of the policies to ensure proper implementation of the budget.

The major budgetary challenges CPD identified for the next fiscal are, implementation of the electoral roadmap, implementation of a large part of the budget by an elected government, and maintaining adherence to the second phase of poverty reduction strategy.

The present caretaker government which placed national budgets for two consecutive fiscal, is likely to hand over power after the upcoming national election scheduled to be held in the third week of December this year. So the second half of the next fiscal is supposed to see a newly elected government at the helm of the state.

Analysing the proposed budget, the civil society think-tank however termed it 'investment friendly' and also 'populist'.

Hiked duty on children's books kicks up an uproar

SURANJITH DEABNATH

Middle class families that send their children to English medium schools will feel the crunch in the next fiscal year as a 25 percent import duty on pictorials and drawing books has been proposed in the national budget.

When educational expenses, especially at English medium schools, already shot up three to four times in the past few years, the recent government move will further heat up the situation and raise prices of books and other educational materials even further, said teachers and guardians of students studying at English medium schools.

Besides, the higher prices of books will also encourage piracy, resulting in loss of customs duty to the state exchequer, they added.

On June 9, Finance Adviser Mirza Azizul Islam in his budget speech said, "Currently, pictorials and drawing books used for educational purposes for our young children are subject to 10 percent customs duty. The content of these books, in most of the cases, are not in conformity with our own values and culture. In the interest of protecting our values and to help our
