Writing the Wrong

I am including the title in the word count by the way and I want to add one of my disclaimers; Palin, the GOP comparing Obama to a terrorist, there are no words. The danger of what could happen, the implications of Palin as President and if her running mate's botox facial nodule keeps growing all bets are off on that score the implications defy category. A leader possibly more Manchurian than the incumbent sharpening his pencils in the oval office (well once he learns how to use the electric sharpener), could beckon in the fall of the Empire well ahead of schedule.

I have been avoiding writing about the election that is four days away, because it is too scary, too depressing, and too surreal. I also watched only two debates, and I believe Tina Fey of Saturday Night Live was a participant in at least one. This is what happened to me: I stopped believing the moment Sarah Palin was chosen as a Veep candidate and I saw a national poll conducted by National Public Radio on her approval rating. More people disapproved but by only one percent! Do you understand what this means? It means that the American people have finally lost their minds. All that brainwashing over the past eight years has finally robbed the American animal of all ability to think rationally.

A few columns back I predicted that the GOP would pull something the moment they saw Obama pulling ahead. The likening of Barack to a terrorist, please, that is kindergarten stuff. Goddamit! We need to bomb somethin' (I believe all Americans will start talking like Palin. It will be a cultural fad, kind of like the way the Spaniards took on the lisp of its king. This was before Penelope Cruz made it amazingly sexy) and so they have, killing eight Syrians, including children. Also, it seems that McCain has gotten the most ringing endorsement of all Al Qaeda! Is it just me, or has the world gone completely off its gourd?

I do understand Al Qaeda's reasoning. They need a raison d'etre to push impressionable young thugs into blowing something or someone up. A conciliatory, open American leader whose middle name is Hussain is going to be hard to sell as a villain.

Would be terrorist: "But, sir, he seems, I don't know, nice."

Terrorist tutor: "Dammit son! He's the enemy. There is no nice in terrorism."

McCain on the other hand will be easy to fashion into something that should be burned in effigy on a regular basis on the streets of Kabul.

Since I started writing this article The FBI has thwarted a skin head plot to kill Barack Obama. Two schmendricks decided to raid a gun shop, kill them some black folks and then drive up to where Obama was speaking and
