The Deserving and the Deprived

MD. ABU SYEED

I totally agree with the writer. We the British Curriculum students are facing numerous social problems. Discrimination and underestimation is a part of our life. If I tell a little story it would be quite clear. One day I was sitting in this bookshop, a teacher of a nearby school came and was looking for one of those guide/notes for a science subject. I was quite surprised to observe that. There was another person sitting beside me. I was told by him that these guidebooks are killing the creativity of the students. Following which, there began an explosive argumentative session about the matter.

One of the people present there said that all the English medium books are written by Indian writers and published from India. As a student of that arena I felt offended. My answer to that comment was simple. If teachers were looking for answers in guides, then what is the standard of education?

One of them told me that the students of O/A-Level are only good in English and nothing else, and they are no match for Bangla medium students in terms of knowledge. All the Bangla medium students are so talented, that only courses like IELTS and TOEFL can make them just as good in English. But now I am experiencing the truth in front of my very own eyes. Every semester when I go through the English and other courses, I generally feel very happy, for the fact that I see a lot of these people having trouble in speaking in English in front of the class. They sometimes even fail to write a simple sentence properly. I am not saying anything to hurt them but this is the fact.

O/A-level students should get the recognition for their knowledge and achievements. O/A-level students are able to communicate with the outer world more effectively than anybody else. In the 21st century communication skill is one of the most important abilities a person should have. Otherwise the person is not fit to meet the challenges of the 21st century.
