JP will ensure the freedom of press and media and proper and effective implementation of the Right To Information Act.

compulsory in institutions where women make up more than half of the workforce. Poor female students will be allowed to continue higher studies for free.

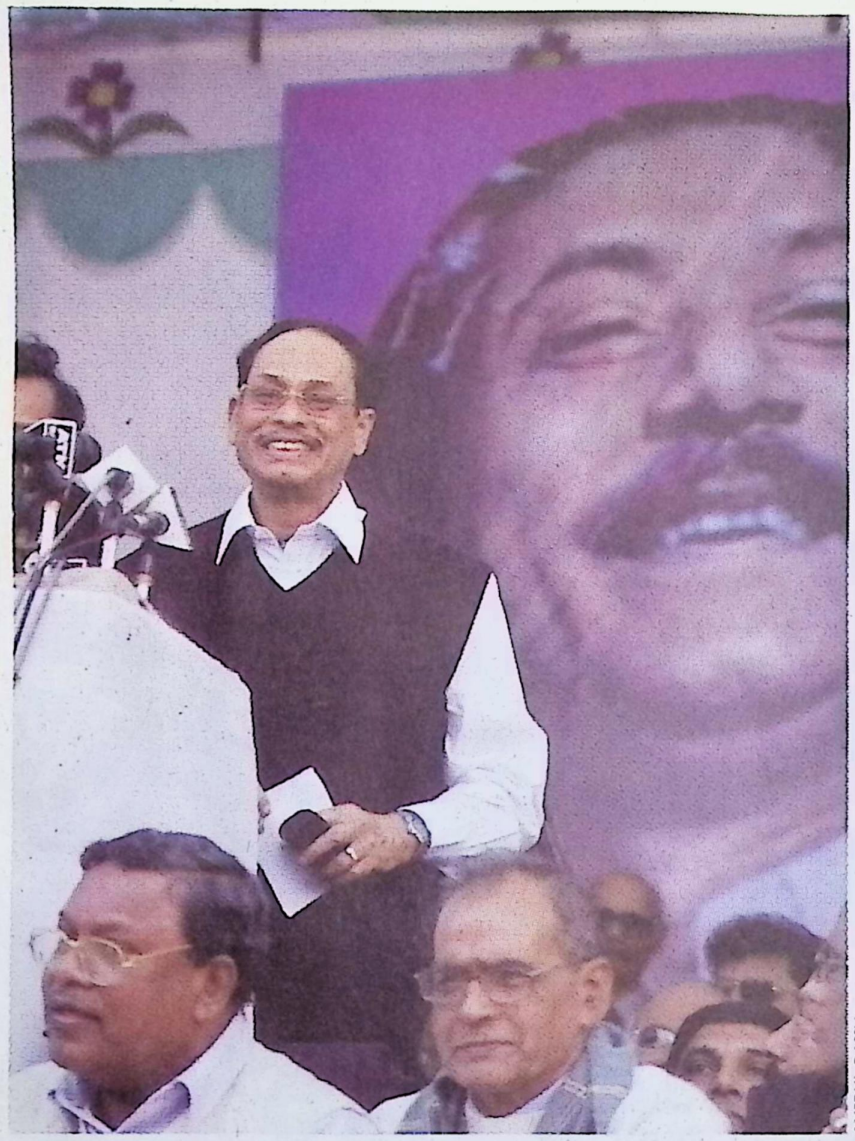

For better governance, strengthening of local government is a necessity and decentralisation of government structure makes it easier.

JP proposes to introduce federal system of government in place of present unitary form by dividing the country into eight provinces. Every province will have a provincial council and a provincial government in addition to the central federal government with a national parliament.

JP proposes a radical reform in national election process by introducing procurement of parliament seats on the basis of total votes received throughout the country by the party and its proportion to the total votes cast. A list of party candidates will be declared earlier on priority basis and candidates are selected from that list as per the above proportion to fill all the 300 seats of the parliament.

JP will re-introduce the upazila system with courts as when it was first introduced during its rule. JP will introduce the post of two vice-chairmen in union parishads with the provision of one woman vice-chairperson.

JP will propose to use the armed forces as a well organised, efficient, and capable institution in the development process during normal peace time. Housing facilities will be organised for the retired armed forces people at different district levels.

AMIRUL RAJIV

In order to improve law and order, the police force will be strengthened with enhancement of number and by providing better equipment and improved training facilities. Housing facilities would be enhanced for the police force.

Imams and moazzams of one selected mosque in every ward of a union will be provided with reasonable monthly remuneration from the government.

For ensuring a democratic environment, freedom of the press and mass media, the right to information, etc are pre-requisite conditions. JP will ensure the freedom of press and media and proper and effective implementation of the Right To Information Act. JP will also take initiative for implementation of e-governance.

JP has served the country in the past and has a record of fulfilling the commitments given to the people. It is hoped that the people will consider the programs from that point of view and will provide support if it is felt suitable so that JP can continue with its proposed welfare activities.

G. M. Quader is a Jatiya Party presidium member and former Member of Parliament.