High time for govt, NGOs to work on women's rights

Rasheda K Chy tells consultation

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

Women and Children Adviser Rasheda K Choudhury at a consultation yesterday said it is time for different government and non-government organisations to work on women rights issues focusing different regional pockets of deprivation.

Drawing an example of Sylhet division, the adviser said it was supposed to recruit 600 teachers in the region during a recruitment test, while only 200 were qualified as the attendance of female candidates were so negligible due to prejudices.

"We have to face big challenges while working on women issues. At the same time, capacity building and orientation and lack of manpower at local level are also big challenges," she added.

Presiding over the consultation organised by women and children affairs ministry at the directorate of women affairs, the adviser said the caretaker government has, however, taken various actions for women empowerment.

The programme titled 'Women development issues with the participation of government and non-government representatives and women leaders' was held under 'Promotion of Gender Equality and Women's Empowerment' project supported by UNFPA. The speakers at the consultation stressed the need to remove the predicaments of institutional mechanisms and to strengthen the ministry of Women and Children Affairs as it is one of the cross cutting ministries.

"Implementation of Cedaw convention is essential for protecting women's human rights," said Ferdous Ara Begum, member of UN Cedaw Committee.

As education and fertility control are the preconditions of women development, it is a must for the ministry to take necessary steps with the intervention of other concern ministries, said Salma Khan, former chairman of UN Cedaw Committee.

The speakers also stressed the need to activating different committees like Women Repression Control Committee and publishing issue based reports annually from the ministry.

The women development issue should be strengthened in association with the inter-ministerial WID (women in development) focal points, they said, adding that a high-quality communication strategy of the ministry is also needed.

Manusher Jonno Foundation Executive Director Shaheen Anam said, "We are lagging behind in different fields for lack of coordination. So, it is important to revive institutional mechanisms," adding that political commitment is important in this regard and there should have continuity of all activities.

"The main function of the ministry is not project-based activities but policymaking and monitoring. The ministry should also address the issues that emerged from different changing situations like climate change issue," said Farida Akhter of Ubinig.

Women and Children Affairs Secretary Rokeya Sultana, Director General Ekram Ahmed, Jatiya Mahila Sangstha Executive Director Ayesha Begum, Bangladesh Mahila Parishad President Ayesha Khanam, Bangladesh Mahila Samity President Selina Khalek, Maleka Begum, Hamida Hossain, Anwara Begum, Rowshan Jahan and representatives from different ministries also took part.

Raja Devashis Roy stressed the cooperation of all agencies concerned among civil society, media and experts to overcome the problem of waste.

A significant number of representatives from various government autonomous and non-government organisations participated in the workshop.
