

om the past

ttive centre of eastern Bengal under the Muslim rulers of Bengal. It survives at present in the yanganj district and the 'golden village' (its literal meaning) is now a township about 27 haka. It is difficult to locate exactly the medieval city, but from the extant remains it appears nded on the east, west and south by the Meghna, the Shitalakhya and the Dhaleshwari Brahmaputra. It rose to some eminence in the nineteenth century when Panam-Nagar was cotton fabrics, chiefly legendary Muslin fabric. The extant remains of Panam-Nagar Hindu merchants following colonial style with inspiration derived from European sources.
