India on Wednesday toppled Australia to achieve their highest-ever ranking of second in the ICC ODI Championship table courtesy the series victory in New Zealand and the world champions' recent dip in form.

With 122 rating points in their kitty, Mahendra Singh Dhoni's men are just a point ahead of Australia, while South Africa sits pretty at the top with 127 points.

The Graeme Smith-led side's success in winning seven out of nine ODIs against Australia this year has consigned the four-time world

Booters reach Nepal

Football

SPORTS REPORTER

The Bangladesh national football team reached the Nepalese capital of Kathmandu yesterday to play a sole warm-up match against Nepal Police on Saturday.

After an initial delay at the airport due to on arrival visas, the booters were taken to Kathmandu's Grand Hotel. The Bangladesh team rested after their arrival yesterday and is scheduled to practice today at the Tribhuvan University Ground. Their match will be held at 4:35 pm on Saturday and is reported to be held at the Dasarath Rangasala Stadium -- Nepal's biggest sporting arena.

Bangladesh's Brazilian coach Edson, Silva Dido has expressed dissatisfaction about the team's progress during their four-week training camp prior to departing for Kathmandu, but conceded that communication between him and the players have improved.

"Four weeks of training is not enough for a national side when you want to change things completely and therefore we have not made any significant progress, but the players have started realizing what I want from them now."

Regardless of Bangladesh's shortcomings, Nepal Police will provide a stern test of credentials that will prepare the booters for the greater challenges of the Challenge Cup. The team will return on April 19.

Meanwhile, the Bangladesh Football Federation (BFF) has been busy with the preparation of the upcoming AFC Challenge Cup from April 26 and are chalking out ways of making the tournament attractive to fans.

The details of the tournament will be finalised on Sunday.

BCB asks Shaju to explain

SPORTS REPORTER

Shahjahan Shaju, the local coach who was reported to have punched an umpire during an age-level game on Wednesday, has been asked yesterday by BCB's game development committee to explain his actions.

According to a source in the cricket board, it was learned that the showcase notice was sent because of no video evidence of the assault.

The umpire, Alamgir Siddiqui, has sent a report to the concerned committees regarding the incident and while an action would have been forthcoming immediately, it is also important that both sides of the story is heard since this is a breach of discipline.

"Once his explanation arrives, we will reach a final decision," said the source.

They say umpires and wicketkeepers get the short end of the stick in the cricket field. An umpire has to be on top of his game every delivery. On a good day, he is said to have done a decent job if he goes unnoticed as only the cricket connoisseur who understands the nuances of the game would definitely mention the umpire; but gone are the days of Neville Cardus.

These days the umpire is only noticed when he has made a mistake. It takes a lot out of a man to stand in the middle when the big screen shows the replay of his mistake within minutes of the error. And it is a brave umpire who doesn't get fazed by the boos and has the mental strength to do a good job thereafter.

Without a shadow of a doubt, umpiring is one of the most demanding jobs in Bangladesh. It involves one being fearless, diplomatic and cool-headed. Add running faster than an angry mob and you have a superhero, something that club officials would want umpires to be.

But umpires cannot be superheroes, at least not in Bangladesh. Most have a hard time surviving on what they earn and try their best to live with dignity.

Some of the senior umpires, who have a space all on to themselves in the country's cricketing tradition, have often lamented the treatment they have been dished out at times. Among these seniors, some have been lucky enough to be elevated into the match referee while the less fortunate ones (of the same batch if not senior) have been given the utterly unrewarding job of a reserve umpire.

In fact the work of an umpire has seldom seen the good days in domestic cricket. It is hard to find a player or a club official praising an umpire, in fact it is almost a custom to blame the umpire. There are several reasons like an inheritance of this bad habit or a simple lack of knowledge of the pitch.

T20, an instant hit

Cricket

AFP, Paris

Sleepy Southampton on England's south coast is an unlikely birthplace for a revolution, but on Friday, June 13, 2003, the first shots were fired in cricket's brave new world.

Under the banner, "Twice the action, half the time", Hampshire beat Sussex by five runs at a packed Rose Bowl in the first Twenty20 match.

The radical, shortest form of the game has since propelled cricket into the 21st century, packaged breezily for live television and transforming players into millionaires.

With the bold and brash Indian Premier League about to start its second season on Saturday, it's easy to forget that Twenty20 was originally seen as a way of saving the sport's traditional invalid -- English county cricket.

"The game in this country [England] has been associated with the middle-class and the middle-aged. White males," said Stuart Robertson, who was the England and Wales Cricket Board's marketing manager at the time and credited with being the brains behind the new format.

"But we discovered that there was a vast potential audience of women and children. And younger men too, aged between 16-34."

Fans in England, most of whom devoured Premier League football, lapped up the bite-size game and crowds exceeded expectations.

John Perera, the ECB's commercial director, told the Guardian newspaper in the run-up to the 2008 season: "We had crowds totalling 250,000 in 2003, 305,000 in 2004, 476,000 in 2005, 500,000 in 2006 and a bit over that last year."

"Every match brings in an average of 75,000 pounds."

Ninety T20 matches were played in 2008. "That means a total of 6.7 million pounds," added Perera. "Add on one million in sponsorship and the game is earning something approaching eight million for the counties."

Twenty20 has become a fixture of international tours and India, the driving force behind the IPL, are world champions.

But as with most revolutions, blood has been spilt.

A group of West Indians became overnight millionaires when they won the controversial, and widely-damned, Stanford Twenty20 against England in the Caribbean last year.

English cricket has since severed all its ties with Allen Stanford after the Texan billionaire was accused of masterminding a 9.2-billion-dollar fraud.

Many fear not only the impact of Twenty20 on technique and tactics, but also on the future of Test cricket, the game's pre-eminent form.

C'Ron stunner lifts Man United

UEFA CHAMPIONS LEAGUE

Manchester United rekindled glorious European nights from their past as a stunning goal by Cristiano Ronaldo fired them to victory over Porto in their Champions League semi-final Wednesday.

No English team had ever beaten the Portuguese champions on their own soil, but the winger's first-half wonder strike gave his team a 1-0 win on the night, 3-2 on aggregate, to set up an all-English semifinal tie with Arsenal.

Coming into the game as underdogs after a 2-2 draw at Old Trafford last week, United boss Sir Alex Ferguson urged his players to bring the spirit of the 1999 treble winning team to the Dragao Stadium.

One flash of genius from the Portuguese maestro coupled with gritty defensive play earned United glory and keeps the red half of Manchester dreaming of the quintuple.

United boss Ferguson started with the same formation as the first leg but had the luxury of picking a fit Rio Ferdinand in defence while midfielder Anderson was given a start against his old club.

The Dragons from Porto were intent on making the same type of start which rocked United last week, but after a promising opening they were stunned by a sixth minute rocket from Ronaldo.

There seemed no danger when the winger drove into the Porto half, but the World Player of the Year took a swing of his right foot and unleashed an unstoppable shot from 35-yards into the top left-hand corner of Helton's goal.

The home team's attacks were disjointed, and it was through set-plays where they were looking most dangerous with defender Bruno Alves firing a 30-yard freekick narrowly wide of the post.

United had been undone by the Portuguese team's slick positional interchange at Old Trafford, and again it was when Rodriguez drifted in from the left-wing that they looked dangerous.

The Uruguay winger found space on the edge of the area and floated a ball to Lucho Gonzalez but the midfielder's acrobatic volley was easily saved by visiting 'keeper Edwin van der Sar.

It was therefore against the run of play when Ryan Giggs nearly doubled United's lead.

The Welshman fired in a volley from Dimitar Berbatov's cross but Helton did well to smother the shot and recovered before Ronaldo could pounce on the rebound.

However, things did get worse for Porto a minute later when midfielder general Lucho was forced of with an injury to be replaced by last week's hero Mariano.

One of the misses of the season prevented United registering a perfect half which would probably have put the tie beyond their hosts.

Giggs whipped in a corner which found defender Nemanja Vidic after Berbatov's flick. Virtually on the goalline and with the goalkeeper nowhere, the Croat somehow sliced the
