The verdict came in response to the writ petition filed by Masudul Alam on behalf of Bangladesh Italian Marble Works Company (BIMWC) to reclaim a cinema hall at Waizghat in Dhaka that the company lost during the military rule.

The BIMWC owned the Moon Cinema Hall at Waizghat. But after the independence, the cinema hall was declared abandoned and the government handed it over to the Muktijoddha Kalyan Trust. The marble company filed a writ petition in 1976, staking its claim on the theatre. In 1977, the HC asked the government to hand over the hall to the company. However, the MLR 7 negated the HC order, making the cinema hall continue to be an abandoned property. In 1994, the BIMWC again filed a writ petition. But the HC and later the Appellate Division said that since the fifth amendment has validated the MLR 7, the company cannot claim ownership of the property.

In 2000, the BIMWC moved against the validity of MLR 7. The implications of the petition have turned out to be farreaching as it hits a wide area of unconstitutional and undemocratic power transfers during the volatile mid-'70s.

While passing the judgment, the HC made a number of observations. It said actions, such as military law and military proclamation by anyone who has come to power unconstitutionally, would be considered illegal as unconstitutional actions can never be validated.

The constitution must take precedence over everything under any circumstances as it reflects the will of the people. Parliament, judiciary, administration, defence and everything else must remain accountable to the constitution.

In another observation, the declares a state of emergency, it must follow the constitution. Only the president can declare emergency in accordance with
