understand the basic functions and mechanisms of NGOs and to encourage the youth to develop their social and business entrepreneurship. After finishing this session, the participants were taken to a field visit to Jaago Foundation, an organisation that aims to empower the unprivileged children with the skills that will allow them to protect themselves from discrimination and injustice. The participants met the children who live in the slum, yet study the same syllabus as of many English medium school students. The amazing part was how they showed their interest in learning English and browsing Internet using the computer lab.

"We were quite moved from the initiatives of Jaago Foundation. The children were given extensive lessons in English. Not only were they able to speak in English, but were actively participating in play, artworks, and other extracurricular activities," said Nandita Khan and Navin Khan, two sisters who took part in the workshop.

Syed Munir Khasru spoke on the last session on 'Personal Development'. During his session, he shared his personal experiences of the real life difficulties, and focused on the major skills for personal development through struggling in this competitive world. Rather than wasting time, he suggested students to ask their seniors about the academic areas they wanted to get in and encouraged the participants to explore their hidden potentials in building human capital.

As the workshop concluded with certificate giving ceremony by Farooq Sobhan, President of Bangladesh Enterprise Institute (former foreign secretary and ambassador), Professor Omar Rahman, Pro-Vice Chancellor of IUB left a riveting note for the young participants.
