Looking for a cognitive change

'CHANGE' is the only constant thing in the universe that exists over time. Everyone needs change. Even, the people of one of the most developed countries, America, want change. We the Bangladeshis also need change.

But I have a different view about the change we need. We are a forgetful nation that can forget every kind of incident (or accident) around us and can get satisfied with simplest of achievements. We feel happy thinking that the mutiny of the BDR could have been stopped, though many of our most talented army officers have been killed. We feel happy now as Bangladesh is not rated as the most corrupt country of the world. In the meantime we stopped talking about eliminating corruption.

Our national cricket team becomes complacent after winning against two weak opponents. But we know the situation of cricket in West Indies and Zimbabwe. Our athletes get overwhelmed after getting the chance to participate in an international competition.

We also forget the promises made by the politicians before the election. Hold on. Don't take me as a pessimist. I also get delighted with the good news of our country. But these things need to be worthy enough. Should not we look forward to something bigger?
