"Rabeya" to make its international festival debut in Singapore

PALLAB BHATTACHARYA, New Delhi

Acclaimed director Tanvir Mokammel's latest work "Rabeya", set in the backdrop of Bangladesh's Liberation War, will make its international festival debut when it is screened at the Singapore Film Festival next month.

The film, starring Aly Zaker, Tauquir Ahmed, Banya Mirza and Chitralkha Guha, has been chosen for screening in the "Cinema Today" section of the festival to be held from April 15 to 26.

It will also be shown in Copenhagen on May 2 at an event organised by Bangladesh-Danish Friendship Association.

Mokammel told The Daily Star that he will not be able to make it to the Singapore festival as he will be in Britain and Denmark during those days. But someone from the unit will attend the festival and represent the film, he added.

Right now, the director is busy editing the rushes of his next documentary "1971" in India. He would return to Dhaka on March 21.

"Singapore festival will be the first international film festival where 'Rabeya' will be shown," he said.

Mokammel will be in Britain from April 15 to May 15 to have professional meetings regarding his next feature film "Jibondhuli", also set against the backdrop of the Liberation War. During the visit he would collect some archival footage for the documentary "1971".

"Then I will go to Denmark where 'Rabeya' will be shown in Copenhagen.

I will also have a meeting with the director of the Danish Film Institute," the director said.

Mokammel is currently editing the rushes of his documentary "1971".

Scorsese eyes posterity not glory

Director Martin Scorsese explains why it is more important that his films stand the test of time than win awards as he launched his new thriller, "Shutter Island".

Three years ago the veteran filmmaker was named best director at the Academy Awards for crime drama "The Departed".

For many, it seemed an overdue accolade for the man responsible for such celebrated movies as "Mean Streets", "Taxi Driver", "Raging Bull" and "Good Fellas".

But while the 67-year-old was happy to be acclaimed by his peers, prizes don't mean much to him in the greater scheme of things.

"It's nice when the films are recognised," he said during a recent visit to London to promote his new psychological thriller "Shutter Island".

"But when you're in the thick of battle, you just try to get through it and make something that allows you to say years from now: 'Yes, I directed that film.'"

"All I can do is try to do the best work I can," he continued. "I can't think in terms of awards."

Which is maybe for the best, given the way his new film was shunted out of awards contention by US movie studio Paramount.

"Shutter Island" is the fourth film that Scorsese (L) has made with DiCaprio.

It has been reported Paramount wanted to use its awards season advertising budget to promote two other movies, "Up in the Air" and "The Lovely Bones".

Given the latter's failure to impress the Academy's membership, however, many in Hollywood are now questioning the wisdom of that strategy.

If Scorsese or leading man Leonardo DiCaprio feels slighted, though, they did not show it during a visit to Europe to present "Shutter Island" out of competition at the Venice Film Festival.

Based on the novel by Dennis Lehane, "Shutter Island" marks DiCaprio's fourth collaboration with Scorsese after "Gangs of New York", "The Aviator" and "The Departed".

That close relationship proved essential for the actor when it came to probing the film's intense subject material.

Set in 1954, it sees DiCaprio play a US Marshal investigating a patient's disappearance from an offshore hospital for the criminally insane.

Once there, though, his character Teddy Daniels makes some startling discoveries which make him question his own hold on reality.

"I'm glad I got to do this character and this film with Marty," says DiCaprio. "It's great to have a guide or a mentor when you're making yourself vulnerable."
