Aila-hit people staring at sky

Bracing themselves for another horrible monsoon as embankment not repaired in 2 years

EMRAN HOSSAIN, back from southwestern districts

Sabitri, mother of three, fights the afternoon gusts as she prepares her dinner in an earthen oven on the embankment of Bangladesh Water Development Board in the open air.

"Now I do not even hope to go back home," says Sabitri as she tries in vain to point to her village in a vast area now under saline water.

Since cyclone Aila hit the southwestern part of the country on May 25, 2009, Sabitri, a resident of South Betkashi union of Koira in Khulna, has been living on the embankment along with 3,200 others.

Since then saline water rushing through the crack during high tide swamps a vast area of over 5,000 acres of the Betkashi union twice every day.

The rest 2,000 inhabitants of the union live in tong, a house built on a raised platform made of bamboos in the water. They are living in the conditions as BWDB could not plug the crack the cyclone had created in a part of the embankment two years ago.

PERFORMANCE IN KEY PUBLIC ISSUES

AL stalwarts, allies critical of govt

HASAN JAHID TUSHER and RASHIDUL HASAN

Frustrations deepen within the ruling Awami League and its allies over the government's handling of crucial issues like soaring food prices, power and gas crises and sliding law and order.

In recent months, several AL stalwarts and chiefs of Jatiya Party, Workers Party and Jatiya Samajtantrik Dal-components of the grand alliance--have criticised the Hasina administration for its poor performance in addressing key public issues.

They also reminded the government of its election pledges and the heavy price it might have to pay for failure to make good on those.

Speaking in parliament in February, AL advisory council member and veteran parliamentarian Tofail Ahmed blasted Communications Minister Syed Abul Hossain for failing to improve the road and rail communications in the last two years.

Most of the lawmakers and Deputy Speaker Shawkat Ali, who was presiding the session, echoed Tofail's observations.

But the next day, Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina took the floor and shielded Abul

IVORY COAST CONFLICT

Fresh assault to remove Gbagbo

REUTERS, Abidjan

Forces backing Ivory Coast presidential claimant Alassane Ouattara began a fresh assault to remove Laurent Gbagbo from his last stronghold in Abidjan yesterday.

As the conflict escalated, France ordered more troops into the West African country to protect civilians.

A convoy of several dozen vehicles containing heavily armed pro-Ouattara troops and outfitted with mounted machineguns entered Ivory Coast's main city at midday, the first elements of a large force that had massed on the northern outskirts for what they called a "final assault," according to a Reuters eyewitness.

Heavy machinegun fire and a few explosions could be heard minutes after they entered the city limits.

The commanding officer of the forces, Issiaka "Wattao" Ouattara, told Reuters he had 4,000 men with him plus another 5,000 already in the city. Asked how long he would need to take Abidjan, Wattao said: "We know when it starts, but could take 48 hours to properly clean (the city)."

Gbagbo has refused to cede power after a disputed November 28 election which U.N.-certified results showed Ouattara won, but Gbagbo rejected the results
