of natural fluctuations in the weather and rising levels of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere has proven devilishly difficult.

The report says it is "virtually certain" -- 99-100 percent sure -- that the frequency and magnitude of record-hot days will increase over the 21st century on a global scale.

The Carnegie Institution's Chris Field, co-chair of the IPCC's Working Group 2, would not comment on the report's conclusions, but said they would help shape political choices.

"When the SREX is finalized and approved by the world's governments, it will provide a solid foundation for smart policies on managing risks from climate extremes and climaterelated disasters," he said by email. The IPCC's landmark
