Rural areas take more consumer goods

STAR BUSINESS REPORT

Rural people have outpaced their urban peers in using advanced consumer goods as a surge in income level and agricultural output and steady remittance flow brought changes to lifestyle in the countryside.

The rural population accounted for 51 percent of the country's total lifestyle products and services consumption in 2010, making the rural areas the next growth markets for both local and foreign brand heavyweights, according to an independent study.

This was revealed at a seminar on "Consumption & Media Habit of Rural Bangladesh: A New Paradigm" at the Westin Hotel in the city.

Nielsen, a global marketing and advertising research company, conducted the "Nielsen Media and Demographic Survey", focusing on people's lifestyle, consumption patterns and media habit.

While presenting the study result, Khalid Hasan, managing director of Nielsen Bangladesh, said the study found the average monthly income nearly doubled to Tk 10,000 and calorie intake went up to 2,300.

The study showed about half of the incomes is spent on food, followed by spending on education and clothing.

He said their expenditure for fast moving consumer goods (FMCGs) has increased sharply. About 22 percent spend on soaps, 20 percent on fairness cream, 19 percent hair oil, 16 percent lotion and 13 percent on shampoo.

The use of toothpaste and intake of soft drinks, packaged food and oil, tea, noodles, condensed milk are all on the rise substantially, said the Nielsen local chief.

He said the countrywide improved road network has also contributed to their lifestyle changes, as 40 percent rural walk to a bus station.

Hasan said about 77 percent of Bangladesh's about 160 million population were born after 1971. About 32 percent of the population is young, aged between 10 and 24 years.

He said the number of people living in the bottom pyramid has also shrunk from 59 percent in 1991 to 32 percent in 2011. The number will further go down to 15 percent in 2021.

Rural areas account for 102 million

Hasan said increase in agricultural output, steady remittance flow, income generating activities and impact of NGO activities have contributed to reducing population now live within a 20-minute rural poverty by over 8 percentage points in five years to 34.2 percent in 2010 from 43.8 percent in 2005.

But the study painted a dark picture for uses of media, as 26 percent of the rural population still does not have any access to television, radio, newspaper, cinema, mobile and other communication vehicles, whereas the national average is 20 percent.

It showed that 67 percent people have television access and 59 percent are connected to mobile network, 21 percent read newspaper once a week and 14 percent listen to the radio.

The TV ownership has tripled in the last decade from 14 percent to 43 percent. About 62 percent rural people watch TV at home while 22 percent go to neighbouring houses.

Bangladesh Television is the most watched television channel in rural areas. 91 percent say they watch programmes on the state-run television channel. It is followed by ATN, with 37 percent, Channel i with 32 percent and NTV with 31 percent.

Cable connection grew by 13 times to 39 percent from a mere 3 percent in 2000.

About 44 percent rural people read the country's most read Bengali newspaper, the Prothom Alo, said the study.

Albeit disappointing, internet penetration doubled to 6 percent in just two years to 2011.

Hasan said all these changes in lifestyle and media habits are down to new-found affluence. "A majority of foreign currency sent by Bangladeshi migrant workers is going directly to rural areas, changing the consumption patterns very fast."

Aman Ashraf Faiz, deputy director marketing of Grameenphone, said the rural life is evolving as people's income level has gone up, opening a new business vista for a number of companies.

He added that rural customers constitute about half of Grameen phone's market.

Monjur-E-Elahi, vice president, marketing operations of Robi Axiata Ltd, said rural lives are transforming. "There is a Bangladesh outside Dhaka, which is rapidly changing."

Aly Zaker, managing director and chief executive of Asiatic Marketing & Communications Ltd and Ashraf-Bin Taj, business director of consumer goods of ACI Ltd, also spoke.

Abu Haniff Khan, additional managing director of Premier Bank, and Gousul Alam Shaon, managing director of Grey Advertising, shake hands over an agreement signed recently. Under the deal, the advertising firm will work as the communication agency for the bank.

Saiful Islam, vice-chairman of Navana Group and Shiro Irrikawa, general manager of Toyota Tsusho Corporation, inaugurate Navana Ltd's new showroom on Progoti Sarani in Dhaka on Sunday.
