

As we observe Victory Day

We must focus on the future

IT is a remembrance of freedom's dawn yet once again. We stand on the threshold of the forty second year since achieving independence in the expectation that the goals for which we went to war against the Pakistan occupation army in 1971 will have come to fruition. It may well be argued, and with justification, that four decades and more are long enough a period for a nation's objectives to be attained. And yet, as we observe Victory Day today, we cannot but be assailed by the sad thought that all too often in all this time, our aspirations as a people have been rudely ridden roughshod over. If it has been extra-constitutionalism which has subverted our democratic hopes, the inability of democratically elected administrations to provide good governance to the nation has stymied our dreams of a just, equal society based on transparency and accountability. It is these thoughts --- and more --- which must be our predominant concern today.

But for all the worries about the nature of politics we have seen dominate the state, there are the positive aspects of life which have given Bangladesh a distinctive flavour, of a kind that cannot but impress the world outside our frontiers. In the field of culture, our drama and music, based on a heritage going back a continuum of time, have created a distinct niche for themselves. In the world of writing and aesthetics, authors have emerged in refreshing droves of creativity, to convince us that this nation remains a symbol of poetry and story-telling, much as it has through the ages. In the economic arena, despite the negative politics which has kept our spirits low, there has been progress across an entire sectoral spectrum. Our garments, in spite of recent tragic incidents, whether organized or accidental, have given the national economy a strong foundation. Abroad, our men and women have worked terribly hard in various countries, sending home hard-earned remittances that have helped their families and given the national economy a certain spurt.

On Victory Day this year, therefore, our expectations tend to rise a little higher given what we have achieved so far. The most significant of those expectations concerns the nature of our politics. For Bangladesh to redeem the pledge it made to itself back in 1971 --- of ensuring a secular, democratic and egalitarian society for all its citizens --- it is important for its political classes to come together in order to build a consensus on pluralistic, accountable governance for the future. Politics must return to being the art of compromise, away from the spectre of tribalism it has been turned into.

That is the least we can do to honour the three million of our compatriots murdered by the enemy in 1971. And it is what we certainly will need to do if we mean to leave a land of happiness and prosperity for our children.

Bravo, climate heroes!

Their enterprises await replication

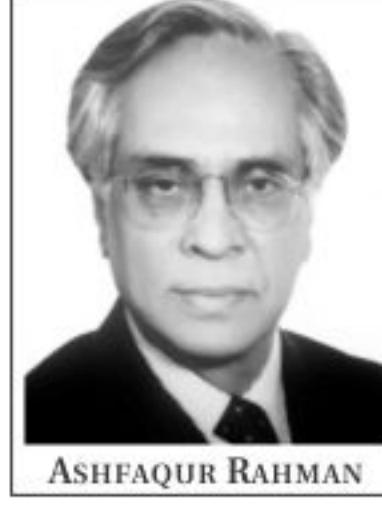

THE HSBC-The Daily Star Climate Awards given to four private organisations and one government department on Friday -- for the third year in a row -- has significance far greater than what meets the eye. Recognition of concrete achievements of individuals and organisations showcased some pioneering efforts at local capacity building in facing up to the climatic change challenges.

By rewarding them for their deeds we have not only honoured them but also us. In the process, the nation is benefited, and that is satisfying particularly in a month associated with the climactic phase of our national freedom struggle.

These awards in addition to spurring the achievers on to expanding their own frontiers will encourage others to follow in their footsteps. And, altogether their cumulative contribution to eco-friendly conservation of environment in the face of a phenomenon that threatens lives and livelihoods of millions around the world underlines our commitment to do our part as the international community strives to reach an agreement on reduction of carbon emissions. That Bangladesh, being one of the most vulnerable countries to changes in the climatic patterns, has taken it upon itself to meet the challenges where it can, is an enormously hope-giving sign.

The Butterfly Park Bangladesh Ltd, Kenpark Bangladesh Apparel (Pvt) Ltd, Prokriti O Jibon Foundation, Rural Services Foundation, Tangail Forest Division received the awards for their pioneering role in social business related to climatic effects mitigation ventures. They established the first butterfly-themed amusement park and green factory in garment sector; disseminated knowledge through biodiversity documentary, made renewable energy accessible to remote rural community; and turned predators into collaborators in the conservation of Modhupur forest through associating the community.

The climate heroes have shown that with the right tools we can forge ahead in responding to the challenge of climactic changes. All they need is facilitation from the

ASHFAQUR RAHMAN

LAST week, political events in Bangladesh had been troubling. First there was the toxic oborodh (physical blockade) and then a full day of countrywide hartal followed by another one for half a day. In the 21st century such political tactics are not only out of date but also very costly economically. They were orchestrated by the opposition parties including BNP. The government reacted by deploying the police and other security agencies. The ostensible purpose was to contain any public violence and disruption to civic life. But the government party brought out its student front to contain any dissent on the streets. The police in this case stood by when these students took the law in their hands. This was evident when a person was hacked to death during hartal, which was recorded by the media but not stopped by the law enforcers. Later, some of the attackers were identified and arrested.

But the greatest indignity was the arrest of the acting Secretary General of BNP, Mirza Fakrul Islam. He was accused of igniting the troubles by asking the public not to bring out their vehicles during the oborodh. He was not given bail. This is for the first time that a general secretary of a major political party had to go to jail for what seems to be ostensibly on political grounds. It does not speak highly of the government because government party leaders had cautioned the opposition parties not to take to violence as they would be challenged on the streets by government supporters. It, therefore, seems to many that the government is establishing two different standards of prosecution for the same alleged malfeasance.

But what are the issues at stake that have made the two main political alliances reach for each other's throats? Are the issues so intractable that they cannot start a dialogue on them? The BNP is angry because they think that they lost the last general election because it was rigged. When the next election takes place, they may again get the short end of the stick because it will be held under the government's watch. The Election Commission (EC) remains a weak body and could wilt under government pressure. Analysts think it may not be able to conduct the elections fairly and neutrally.

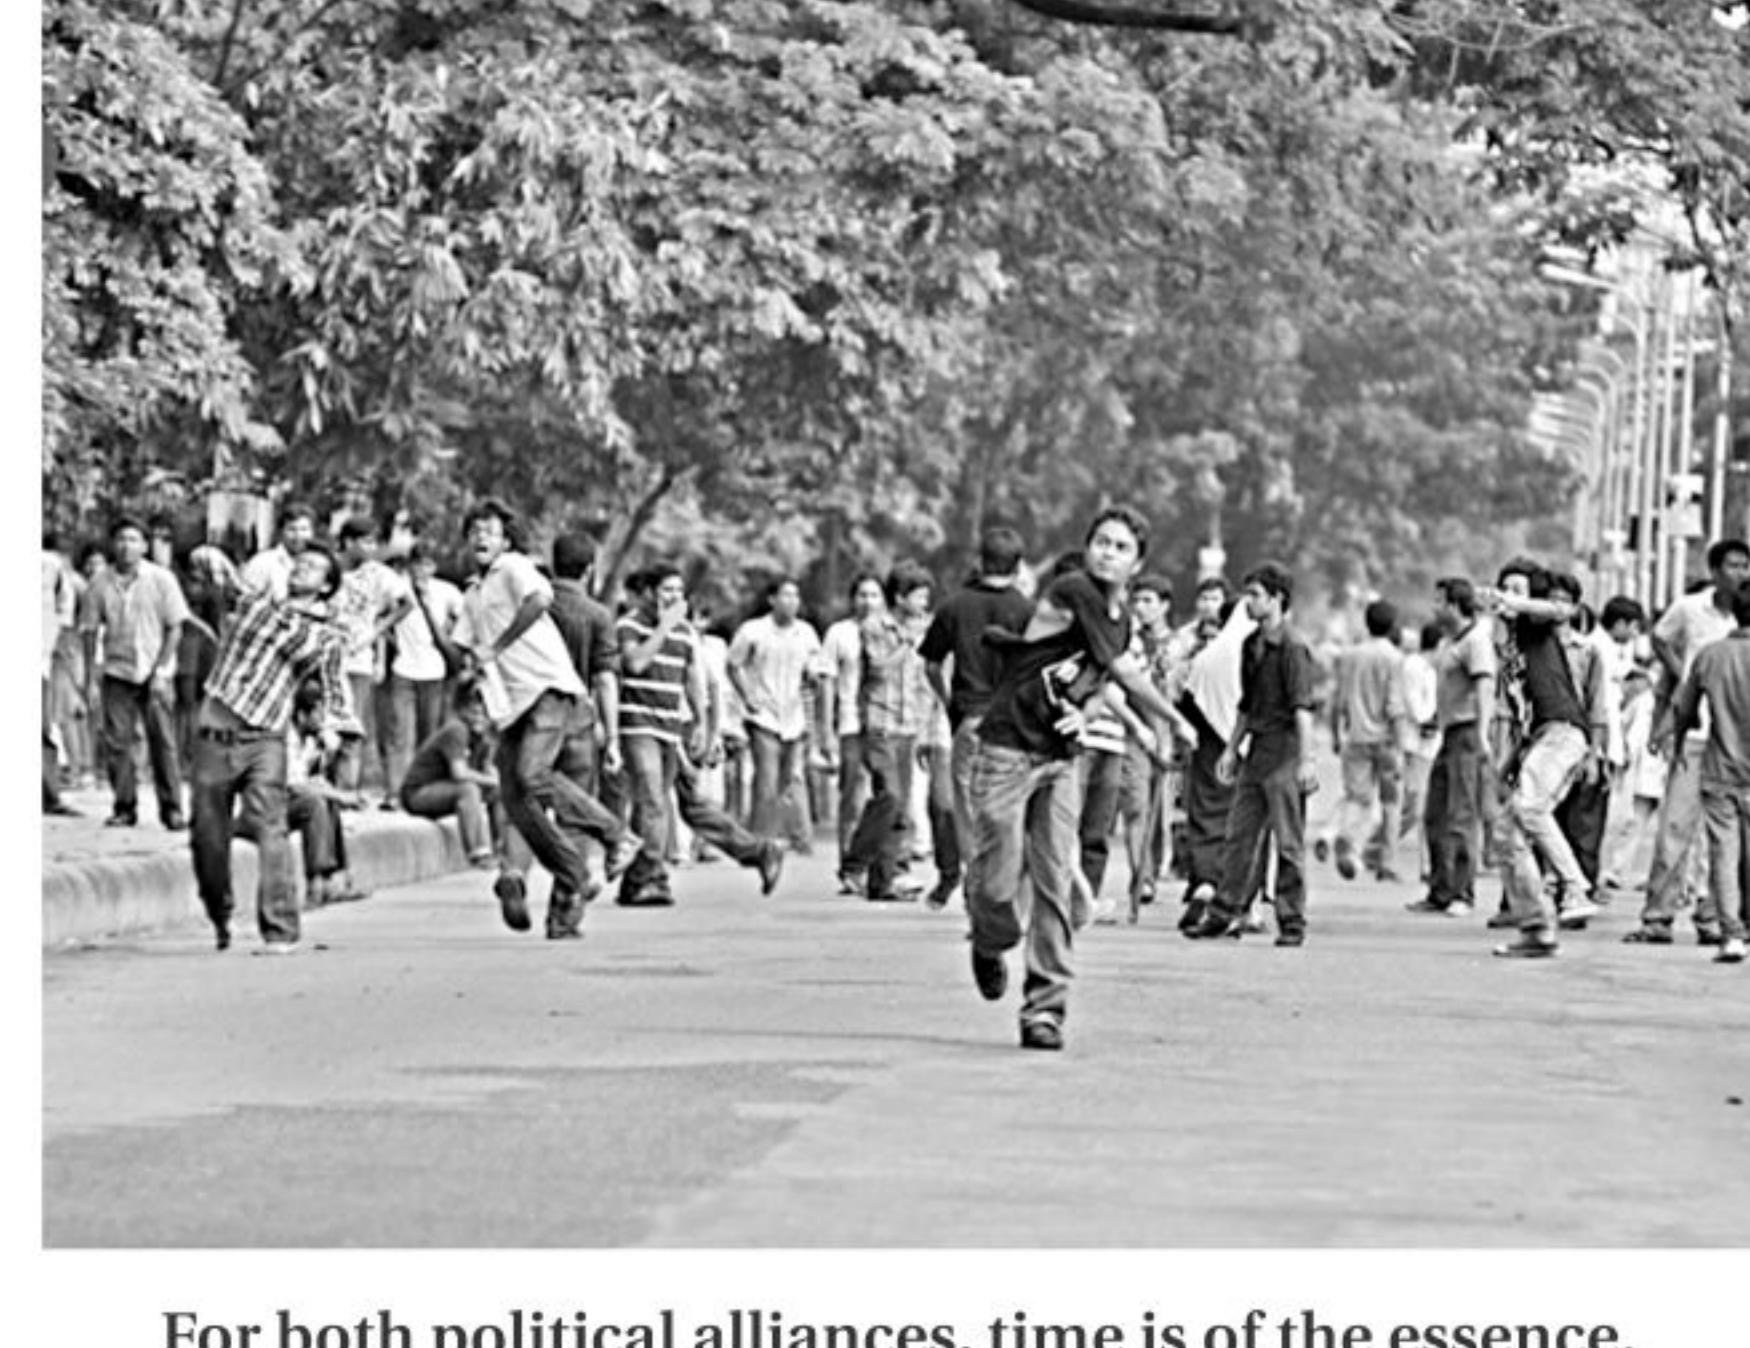

The government, on the other hand,

Making sense of nonsense

is saying that the BNP wants to disrupt the holding of the trial of those accused of 1971 war crimes by creating an anarchic situation. It says that the opposition is trying to invite unknown "third forces" that would in turn suspend holding of the all-important war crimes trials. The government is pledge bound to the people of the country to hold these trials because it won the last election based on the commitment do so. They have chosen the street to settle political questions. They say that the government has created an adversarial environment in the parliament, which does not encourage sober elements in the opposition to even suggest that it is time to return to parliament.

Are we, therefore, headed towards anarchy which will cause unnecessary loss of lives, property and prosperity?

For both political alliances, time is of the essence. As history has shown, people can be quite unforgiving when their daily lives are continuously disturbed. Political posturing and petty political gains are of no consequence then. A ground swell could indeed be beyond the control of either or both the alliances.

So what can we do now to bring sense out of this nonsense?

made in its election manifesto.

So what is the way out of this impasse? Where are the sober elements in both the political alliances who can advise correctly as what to do to defuse the situation? We have noticed an escalation in political intolerance and the impunity with which both the political alliances conduct themselves. Mirza Fakrul in many ways is an exception to this political genre. He has conducted himself with dignity and has played within political norms. So why would the government charge him unless there are cogent grounds, other than political, to indict him? To many, the developments last week extend beyond their understanding.

Of course, one way out is for the members elected from various parties to sit down in parliament and thrash things out. But the BNP is unwilling to Indeed, prosperity is vitally at stake. Even with political instability this country has achieved an average of 6% annual rate of growth of GNP over the last decade or so. Imagine, with political stability and vision we could easily have achieved 8% or more growth annually. Does Bangladesh, the sixth largest democracy in the world, deserve this? Is this the way we remember our valiant freedom fighters who gave their lives in the hope that one day this hallowed land and its good people would not wallow in squalor and a dysfunctional political order?

For both political alliances, time is of the essence. As history has shown, people can be quite unforgiving when their daily lives are continuously disturbed. Political posturing and petty political gains are of no consequence then. A ground swell could indeed be

Path to Asian era

EDITORIAL DESK: The Korea Herald

HAVING caught the international community off guard with its long-range rocket launch on Wednesday, North Korea is pushing neighbouring powers into another guessing game over whether it will go ahead with a third nuclear test. Pyongyang has a record of having done so in the wake of missile firings in 2006 and 2009.

The impoverished regime under its young leader Kim Jong-un may believe the provocative acts in defiance of international pressure will help shore it up and bring more bargaining chips into its hands. The likelihood, however, is that such a confrontational course will only lead to advancing the possible collapse of the regime under strengthened international sanctions, aggravating the security situation on the Korean Peninsula and in Northeast Asia.

As some observers note, Pyongyang may not have made an exact calculation of the impact its rocket launch, which seemed mainly aimed at heightening Kim's stature and consolidating his power, would have on the key elections in Japan and South Korea to be held within three days of each other next week.

It has yet to be seen in which direction the rocket launch will tilt the balance between the conservative and liberal contenders in South Korea's presidential poll next Wednesday. But it is certain that Pyongyang's latest provocation will serve to cement the prospect of Japan's right-wing political forces winning the parliamentary election Sunday.

Pyongyang's rocket launch, coupled with the possibility of its third nuclear test, will help strengthen Japanese conservative politicians' voices for military buildup. Shinzo Abe, leader of the main opposition Liberal try would welcome a rearmed Japan as a counterweight to China's growing military assertiveness in the region. His statement, which was not expected to come from the top diplomat of a nation occupied by Japan for three years from 1941, reflects the Philippine government's concerns about Beijing's high-handedness in their territorial dispute over a group of islets in the South China Sea.

China may feel it somewhat awkward to blame the Philippines and other Southeast Asian neighbours for supporting Japan's military buildup when it is pushing them overboard by laying claim to virtually all areas of the disputed sea. It was also the Japanese public's fear of an increasingly assertive China that has turned them in favour of right-wing politicians with a nationalistic agenda.

With South Korea and Japan changing governments following China's power transition last month, it may be a time that the three nations and some Southeast Asian countries rethink how they could reduce confrontation and enhance cooperation to usher in the Asian century.

Democratic Party, who is expected to return to the premiership he held for a year in 2006-07, has vowed to seek the revision of Japan's pacifist constitution to have a full-fledged military. Some conservative candidates for the lower house election have gone further to demand that Japan should be nuclear-

Southeast Asian countries rethink how they could reduce confrontation and enhance cooperation to usher in the Asian century. A US intelligence assessment of global trends, released this week, forecast Asia will surpass North America and Europe combined by 2030 in terms of economic size. A prosperous Asia might turn into reality only when regional powers contain risks of confrontation and focus on building harmony in pursuit of common interests.

China should recognise its acts could be its worst enemy and reintroduce the international pragmatism that has served so well its "peaceful rise" over the past decades. Japanese leaders should realise that the path toward blind nationalism cannot lead them to the goal of building a country that makes its people proud of being born there. The Philippines and other Southeast Asian nations need to consider more fundamental ways to secure regional stability, rather than prodding Japan to go militaristic.

The next administration in Seoul should have a far-sighted diplomatic strategy for assuming a role in achieving a prosperous and harmonious Asia beyond managing conflicts on the peninsula.
