up on patients to find out how they are doing and whether they were able to get a job after being released from the hospital.

"We will also help them with vocational training if they need or want to change their line of work, to make sure that they are provided with a sustainable future plan," says Abida Rahman, Donor Liaison Officer, Fundraising Department, CRP.

She adds that training will be provided to caregivers of patients to ensure that at least one person of the family can earn a living even if the other is unable to work any longer due to his/her disability.

While these organisations and individuals continue to work toward the healing and rehabilitation of the Savar survivors and their families, we, the people, also have a responsibility towards these brave souls. We cannot voice our abhorrence of the criminals only within the comfort of our homes. We can no longer mourn our helplessness. We have the power to change the fortunes of these survivors.

. Our contributions, however small, can give them the confidence to return to society with renewed hope and the will to live. These people have suffered enough. We can ease their suffering through our actions, our support. We can choose not to let this be yet another forgotten chapter in the history of industrial tragedies. Now is the time to lend a helping hand, to show the survivors that they are not alone, that we are with them, that they can turn to us for help, and that we won't let them down. ■
