 Replying to a question, Inu said the government was sincere about a dialogue with the opposition. "We are waiting for their response, our invitation is still there." Referring to the opposition leader, the minister also reiterated his Tuesday's remarks, "If you fail to board the train of dialogue, you will miss the train of election." Inu also said the media was now so strong that rigging was not possible by evading its sharp eye.

Answering another question, he said in the name of religion, Hefajat-e Islam wanted to bring BNP-Jamaat to power. He criticised Hefajat chief Shah Ahmed Shafi for his misogynist comments involving female garment workers and women education. In his speech, the minister highlighted the successes of the government particularly citing the increase in production of food, electricity, and founding of health centres at unions and development in the ICT sector. Inu also said the government had tried to establish the thing that no one was above law in the country, no matter how much powerful he might be. He categorically said Bangladesh would be freed from war criminals and the verdicts of their trial would be executed. In another reply, the minister said, "Yes, we have some failures...we will not punish the 'Tentul Hujur' (Hefajat chief), and we could not ban Jamaat-e-Islami."
