on a three-day visit, said he hoped that post-election political stability could lead to economic progress.

He laid stress on giving particular attention to the garment industry. "You export over $20 billion [worth of garment products] every year, but it is important that the standards in the industry are lifted in order to set higher standards for the sector."

Duncan also wanted to see that the success in this sector was matched with higher standards at work for those who make the readymade garments.

the Liberation War, as his father worked there.

Hasan's father Syed Musleh Uddin was the vice president of Pakistan Democratic Party (PDP) for East Pakistan and chairman of Peace Committee in then Kishoreganj sub-division in 1971.

Both PDP and Peace Committee worked against Bangladesh's liberation.

The investigator said he had found some evidence supporting the allegations of a mass killing, murders, arson, looting and confinement.

He said currently Hasan was not involved with any political party but once he was involved with Nezam-e-Islami, another anti-liberation organisation, which was banned immediately after the war but restarted operation in Ziaur Rahman's regime.

Meanwhile, the International Crimes

Tribunal-2 yesterday fixed today for hearing the opening statement from the prosecution in the case against Jamaat-e-Islami leader Abdus Subhan.

The prosecution was supposed to place their opening statement on March 27 but the tribunal-1 that day transferred the case to the tribunal-2 on its own motion.

Subhan, then vice-president of Pabna district Peace Committee, an anti-liberation organisation, is facing nine charges of genocide and crimes against humanity committed in Pabna in 1971.

The tribunal also completed recording the cross-examination of Lutfar Rahman Faruk, 20th prosecution witness against another Jamaat leader Mir Quasem Ali.

The court adjourned the proceeding until April 6.

Quasem is facing 14 charges of crimes against humanity committed in Chittagong during the nine-month war.

relief after the January 5 elections.

Meanwhile, Duncan expressed satisfaction over the discussion with Shahriar Alam, and gave assurance of continued cooperation with the government.

"I had a very good meeting. Particularly we spoke about the future of the millennium development goals (MDGs) because Bangladesh is very important for our development efforts from the UK," he told journalists after the meeting.

About the garment industry issues, Duncan said all NGOs, the government and other stakeholders needed to work together to modernise the sector.

Duncan who arrived on Monday to weigh the progress on health and safety standards in the garment industry also met Finance Minister AMA Muhiith, Labour Minister Mojibul Haque Chunnu and Raushan Ershad yesterday.

He will press for political dialogue to strengthen democratic accountability in Bangladesh during his stay in Dhaka. Duncan is due to meet Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina and BNP Chairperson Khaleda Zia today.

environment and developing business skills for women entrepreneurship.

Rokia Afzal Rahman, president of Metropolitan Chamber of Commerce and Industry, said the rural women who had availed micro-finance not only brought an economic change but also changed the social structure as they now played role in decision making in their families and communities.

The noted entrepreneur identified deep-rooted discrimination, insufficient network and limited access to credit as the major hurdles for South Asian women to become successful entrepreneurs although they represent half of the population in the region.

She also shared a particular incident where many had frowned when she went to get a bank loan to purchase a land on her own.

US Ambassador Dan W Mozena said the bottom line was that development and progress was driven by women.

Referring to the persistent inequality and poverty as the toughest challenge for South Asia, Hasan Mazumdar, country representative of TAF, said unfortunately women's role and participation in regional connectivity and trade had been far less than expected.

Milk Vita purchases analysers

The machines examine contents of milk through using infrared technology and do not require any chemical, said Tony Malstrom, managing director of Miris AB.

The traditional methods used by the dairy require sulfuric and nitric acids to check only the quantity of fat, he added.

Mohammad Munir Chowdhury, managing director of Milk Vita, said, "The technology will also help ensure that the honest dairy farmers are getting the right price of the milk."

There is no alternative to introducing modern technologies to combat milk adulteration, as the practice is very rampant in Bangladesh, he observed.
