The youths demanded that development activities by destroying trees be stopped, and a policy in this regard be formulated. They also carried different placards that read "Not trees, chop me", "No trees, No rain". Many locals participated in the programme and expressed solidarity with the demands. Installing plastic trees for beautification in place of real ones is a rare thing in other countries, which can only be seen in Bangladesh, said Shahed Alam, organiser of Shobujpata. After the human chain, the participants visited the areas where the trees had recently been felled.

South Asia" before a congressional subcommittee on Wednesday. Desai said the US would keep pressing Bangladesh to resolve intense feuding but acknowledged that "we haven't seen a tremendous amount of movement." Steve Chabot, chairman of the Subcommittee on Asia and the Pacific, House Committee of Foreign Affairs, encouraged sustained effort to encourage political progress in Bangladesh. "If it's not resolved, I'm afraid the violence is going to escalate and an ally--a good ally of the United States and one that has kind of traditionally been looked upon as a model for a moderate Muslim country--could become just the opposite," he said. 'DEMOCRATIC EVOLUTION AT CROSSROADS' Separately speaking on the political aspect, an USAID official said the democratic institutions in Bangladesh developed over the past decades were at "risk of backsliding" without a renewed commitment to participatory and inclusive politics. "Bangladesh has a promising history of political pluralism, representative institutions, civic engagement and tolerance, but currently finds itself at an important crossroad[s] in its democratic evolution," said Denise Rollins, acting assistant administrator, United States Agency for International Development, Asia Bureau, on Wednesday. She made the remark while describing how USAID development programmes in India, Bangladesh, Nepal, Sri Lanka and the Maldives address regional challenges.
