Sincerely,

Your friends at The Self Worth Protection Agency

If you ignore this first notice and fail to meet the terms of your probation, you are summoned to headquarters where you find yourself in the world's longest queue, made up of mostly women, funnily enough, though quite a few men as well. You wait in that line with a number. When your number is called you are asked to stand on a scale. A taciturn employee asks you to estimate your own worth. Since you are keen to get out of the place pronto, you lie and give them an estimate well above what you actually believe. You are met with a deep sigh and an eye roll, some might even laugh in your face. "Ok, let's try this again," they will say. "When you stayed in a relationship for three years with a man who spent time with you only when it was convenient for him, rarely called you, stiffed you with a hotel bill after a romantic getaway, and told other women how amazing and beautiful they were on Facebook but never gave you a compliment, you believed your self worth was this high?" They point to a line on the scale that falls under "very healthy sense of self worth". Abashed, you remain silent. "How about the fact that you have not gotten your prostate checked yet? Or when you accepted a job that took you away from your children because it paid you a lot of money?"

Eventually, you break down. The laundry list of the times you acted against your own self-interest astonishes you. You give them your actual estimate and thus the process of restoration and reclamation begins in earnest.

How wonderful such a place would be. Because we all get lost. ■
