Gouripur House needs urgent attention

AMINUL ISLAM, Mymensingh

Located on the banks of Old Brahmaputra River at Jubilee Road in the district town, the quaint two-storey 100-year-old Gouripur House continues to attract attention.

Unfortunately, the ground floor of the house is now used only for the disbursement of allowances by Sonali Bank Principal Office. The wooden second floor is used as the 'guest house' for senior officials of the bank.

The architectural beauty of the century-old house with a beautiful garden as the centre-piece continues to announce the presence of the erstwhile zamindars of the Gouripur dynasty.

The authentic date of its construction is unknown. The consensus is that Brajendra Kishore Roy Chowdhury, a zamindar of Gouripur established the 'Gouripur House' for the use of the family.

Brajendra Kishore Chowdhury (1281-1364 Bengali Year), also a renowned classical music maestro, held programmes in Gouripur. Leading classical masters of the sub-continent such as Enayet Khan (father of Ustad Vilayat Khan), Mohammad Ali Khan, the heir of classical master Tansen; Ustad Masid Khan, Ustad Uzir Khan, Hafiz Ali Khan, Dabir Khan performed at functions organised in Gouripur.

Brajendra Kishore's son Birendra Kishore Roy Chowdhury, a classical maestro was also adept at musical instruments like Surbahar, Sursringar, Esraj and Beena. Birendra published a monthly newspaper 'Sangeet Bigyan Probeshika' from Kolkata. He wrote two books on classical music -- "The status of Tansen in Hindustani Music" and "Raga Sangeet".

During the British regime, the house was very regal with presence of zamindars, and should be preserved as a part of history of architecture, said centenarian Sohrab Uddin Sarker, a resident of Char Gobindapur village in Mymensingh sadar.

After partition in 1947, the house was used as a branch of National Bank of Pakistan. Later, the house was made a branch of Sonali Bank after Liberation War and the branch continued at the house till 1985. After constructing a new building for bank's principal office in 1985, the house was left abandoned, according to sources.

During a visit, this correspondent discovered that five rooms on the second floor are being used as a 'guest house' for senior officials and their bearers, and as a kitchen. It is hazardous to cook food on the second floor of such a historical house, said insiders.

On a request to hand over the house to Department of Archeology (DoA), a senior official of the bank said the house was the bank's property and they could not transfer it to DoA.

While the DoA expressed interest a few years ago in taking the house under its wing, the bank authorities did not respond, said Dr. Ataur Rahman, regional director of DoA.

According to the Antiquities Act-1968, the house is a national heritage now as it is a 100-year-old structure and no quarter can demand it as their own property, said an official.

MOHAMMAD RAFI

The humble great artiste

SYED BADRUL AHSAN

It is hard to forget Mohammad Rafi. There was the supreme artiste in him. More specifically, there was the voice of God in him, in his renditions of songs. You get a taste of it in the Bahadur Shah Zafar ghazal, na kisi ki aankh ka noor huun / na kisi ke dil ka qarar huun. There are all the moments when Rafi reminds you of the glory of the Creator. Sit back and reflect on the spirituality which shines through in parwardigar-e-alam tera hai hai sahara / tere siwa jahan mein koi nahin hamara. You are then perhaps closer to God than you have been at any other time in your quotidian existence.

Thirty four years after Rafi's remains went into the grave, it is the greatness of the artiste that lives on. And it is greatness which comes wrapped in humility. He never drank, indeed never indulged in anything that was forbidden by his faith. The call to prayer was a duty he consistently answered. Observe all the images of him, some faded, quite a few grainy, but most as bright as daylight. There is always a smile, that of child-like innocence, which endlessly brightened his features. The man was symbolic of luminosity.

And nowhere was this luminosity more pronounced than in the versatility he brought into his music. If he could invoke God and have you go into a trance-like state with his songs of faith, he could also arouse in you --- and it did not matter how young or aged you were --- the ecstasy which came of being in love. The song, takra gaya tum se dil hi to hai, is proof of the profound depths to which love could sink in order to rise into fullness. But, surely, the course of true love never did run smooth. The pain which underlies love as it gets entangled in myriad emotions flows in kabhi khud pe / kabhi haala pe / rona aaya. Love all too often turns into remembrance of all the good and the pure that has been. Again, Rafi gives powerful voice to that emotion in yaad na jaaye beete dino ki / jaa ke na aaye jo din / dil kyun bulaye unhen.

There was the unassuming about Mohammad Rafi. For him the art of music was all. He would not be a celebrity, would not be an individual happy to bask in the adulation of crowds. The urge for music, which came early, constituted for him the essence of being. At age ten, it was the simple song of a beggar seeking alms every morning that laid bare before him the power of music. Rafi would follow the beggar for as long as he could and return home humming the man's tune. Music, then, was for him never a contrived affair. He breathed it, lived it, in innumerable ways. In his songs came large doses of comedy. The image is Johnny Walker's, but the comic is in Rafi's rendering of ae dil hai mushkil jeena yahan. Shammi Kapoor's on-screen tomfoolery could not have been conveyed by anyone other than Rafi. Think of Lal Chharhi maidan kharhi here. Or, through Biswajit's screen portrayal of it, April fool banaya / to un ko ghussa aaya / to mera kya qasoor / zamane ka qasoor / jis ne dastoor banaya.

Rafi had a range of voice that could take his songs to Olympian heights, as in O duniya ke rakhwale / sun dard bhare mere naale and zindabad zindabad / ae mohabbat zindabad. It could also glide into a perfect pitch suitable for expressions of placid and yet passionate romance --- in aise to na dekho ke hum ko nasha ho jaaye, in sau baar jahan lenge, in tere ghar ke saamne ki ghar banaoonga, in tere mere sapne ab ek rang hain. There are all the instances of impatient romance in him. Think of wo saadgi kahan isse diwani kahan / un ka barha jo haath yahan dil luta dia and main pyar ka rahi huun / teri zulf ke saaye mein / kuch der theher jaoon and banda parwar thaam lo jigar / ban ke pyar phir aaya huun.

The Rafi repertoire has a universal quality that treats you to an endless flow of music. If his solos excite your romantic sensibilities, the duets with Lata, Asha, Geeta Dutt, Suman Kalyanpur, Noor Jehan and others only enhance the urge in you to love yet once more. Recall jeet hi lenge baazi hum tum and tere husn ki kya tareef karoon and aaja ke intezar mein jaane ko hai bahar bhi and teri duniya se door chale ho ke majboor and kabhi raat din hum duur the din raat ka ab saath hai.

The day loses itself in the shadows of the night. From out there in the gathering dark comes a sense of inebriation as Mohammad Rafi sings koi saghar dil ko behlata nahin and chhoo leno do nazuk honton ko and hum bekhudi mein tum ko pukare chale gaye and chhalkaye jaam aaye aap ki ankhone ke naam.

Rafi's constellation of songs winds its way, always, deeper into an ever-unfolding universe of melody. Here on earth, the collective heart sings for him: tere bin soone nain hamare.

Mohammad Rafi, pre-eminent singer of Indian film songs, bhajans, ghazals and what not, died on 31 July 1980

"Working with Saif not a priority"

-- Kareena

When real life couple Kareena Kapoor and Saif Ali Khan teamed up on the screen, their chemistry failed to entice audiences. Now, they are not interested in doing a project together. In fact, working with Saif doesn't top Kareena's priority list. When asked why they are not seen on the screen, Kareena said: "It's not on the top of our list."

Their romance said to have blossomed on the sets of "Tashan" and later when they teamed up for "Kurbaan" and "Agent Vinod", the news scorched the headlines, but their chemistry failed to scorch the screen. In fact, all the three films turned out to be damp squibs.

The scripts should be blamed, Kareena argued. "If the films have not worked, then I feel the story was not that great! I don't believe in things like chemistry and I feel the pairing depends on the story. If the story is strong the chemistry also looks good. If story is not good you can't do anything," she said.

"I am happy not to work with Saif," added the 33-year-old, who married Saif in 2012.

No bar on music behind bars

UK lifts ban on steel-string guitars in prison cells

A ban on steel-string guitars in prison cells in England and Wales has been reversed after a campaign by rock stars including Billy Bragg and Johnny Marr.

Prisoners had been unable to play the instruments outside supervised sessions since rules were changed last November.

Bragg, Marr, Pink Floyd's David Gilmour and Elbow's Guy Carvey were among the guitarists who signed a letter saying the move undermined rehabilitation.

The government said the rules had been relaxed after feedback from governors.

However, a Ministry of Justice spokesperson said rules preventing prisoners from receiving books would remain in place.

Billy Bragg founded Jail Guitar Doors, a scheme that has sent around 350 guitars to prisons since 2007. Most were steel-stringed, he said. "As an incentive to engage in rehabilitation individual access to steel strung guitars can really help the atmosphere on a prison wing," the musician said.

"I've had a number of projects involving guitars on hold which now will be able to go ahead, and will allow those using music in prisons to get on with this important work."

The ban was introduced in November as part of a wider tightening of the privileges that prisoners were allowed.

Inmates will still need to earn the right to have the instruments through good behaviour. A Ministry of Justice spokesperson said: "Following feedback from prison governors, we have made a few minor adjustments to the property prisoners are allowed to have. These are still subject to individual risk assessments and can be refused by governors."
