AL PACINO Parties On As Aging Rocker In 'Danny Collins'

Pacino stars as aging 1970s rocker Danny Collins, who can't give up his hard-living ways. But when his manager (Christopher Plummer) uncovers a 40-year-old undelivered letter written to him by Lennon, he decides to change course and embark on a heartfelt journey to rediscover his family, find love and begin his second act. "It's very exciting to do what we're all about — putting film in the marketplace," said Bleecker Street's President of Distribution Jack Foley, who had served in the same role at Focus Features. "[The film] has been with us since the beginning back in September and is a signature of what the company is about: entertainment that targets adult audiences." Foley noted that Danny Collins will sit most naturally with crowds 35 and above but added, "It can certainly play to younger people." Bleecker Street's marketing has targeted the 35-plus audience in the lead-up to this weekend's release. "Al Pacino is an icon among that crowd," said Foley. The movie was released last week, on March 19.

It's a hard industry to work in Katrina Kaif

Model-turned-actress Katrina Kaif says the industry only has space for those who are passionate about their craft - age notwithstanding. Facing the arclights might seem like a cakewalk for many but Katrina, who at one point in her career, gave six back-to-back hits, doesn't find it easy. "It's a hard industry to work in. It's not easy on a person to be sometimes 14 to 15 hours on the sets. Sometimes, you don't have a lunch or dinner break. It's taxing on a person. You have to be passionate about making movies. So, till the time you are passionate about it, there is space for you in the industry," Katrina said. At 31, she has films like 'Jagga Jasoos' and 'Fitoor' in her kitty. She doesn't see age as limitation in the field. Citing examples of actresses like Madhuri Dixit and Sridevi, who came back to films after becoming mothers, Katrina said that it's not age that decides a woman's fate in showbiz.
