CHEN KAIGE

Born on August 12, 1952, in Beijing, China, Chen Kaige was only 14 when China's Cultural Revolution began. His family was comprised of music lovers -- his sister played the piano, Chen played violin, and his father had an extensive record collection that the whole family enjoyed. But in 1966, the Red Guard smashed the collection in front of the entire family. Later, in school, Chen had to denounce his father, and had to live on the streets, and he and his friends had to find dark rooms where they could hide and listen to classical music.

He later joined the Red Guard and was sent to another province to work in the forests for eight years. During that time his father, once an established filmmaker, was forced to clean bathrooms. Although for years Chen agonized over having denounced his father, they were able to repair their relationship once the Cultural Revolution ended. In 1975, Chen worked in a film processing plant, and then in 1978, when the schools reopened, he entered the Beijing Film Academy. He made his directorial debut for television in 1984 with Qiang xing qi fei, followed by the feature Huang tu di (1984), for which he wrote the screenplay. The film won several awards when it was shown at international film festivals, and Chen's next film, Da yue bing (1986), was also a prize winner.

In 1987, Chen moved to New York when he received a scholarship to study filmmaking at NYU. His first big international hit was Farewell My Concubine (1993). The story takes place in a Peking opera troupe, and because his father made many Peking opera films, Chen asked him to work on the film. Farewell My Concubine won many awards, including a BAFTA award for "Best Film not in the English Language" and a Golden Globe for "Best Foreign Language Film" as well as an Oscar® nomination for cinematography. The film was a commercial success, making millions of dollars at the box office.

His film The Emperor And The Assassin (1999) had the distinction of being the most expensive film ever made by a Chinese director, and was nominated for the Golden Palm award when it was screened at the Cannes Film Festival. For his next project, Chen decided to return to his roots and make a film about a violin prodigy and his father. He came up with the idea after seeing a television program about a real prodigy, and he co-wrote the screenplay as well as directed the film, called Together (2003).

Chen Kaige is currently married to Chinese actress and film producer Chen Hong. They married in 1993 and have two children together.
