Is your vet a safe bet?

NOWADAYS more and more city dwellers are opening their homes to animals of all kinds. Sadly despite that, our veterinary sector is quite poor and it seems as though it will remain like that for years to come. Even the most well known vets have their share of horror stories. Most of them charge outlandish prices and do not provide equal care in return.

Before you open your doors to a pet, be it a chicken or a dog, you must have at least two vets on your contact list. You never know when you will need them. There are some factors you should consider when you pick your vet and a few warning signs you should look out for.

First off, you should take note of his reputation. There are plenty of Facebook groups where you can ask around and get the general consensus on any vet's skills. Personally, I have yet to find a vet offering the complete package. Government doctors are your safest bets. Though the conditions of their chambers are poor, their skills as a vet more than make up for it. But that is my personal opinion. You must form your own viewpoint regarding your chosen vet. If you have the time, you should visit a few of the chambers so you can know about the conditions and build a good rapport with them before bringing the patient in.

This brings me to the next point- communication. Animals cannot tell the vet where it hurts and it is your responsibility to pinpoint what is wrong with your pet. Do not by any means just leave everything up to the vet. Talk to them and ask anything that comes to mind. I suggest making a list of questions beforehand. There is no such thing as a stupid question when it comes to medical care. Do not be ashamed if you don't know something. It's never too late to learn something new. More importantly, by asking questions you can get an
