NEWS ANALYSIS

Eid road crashes can't just be wished away

SHAHNOOR WAHID

A good number of fatal road accidents during the Eid vacation across the country have left many people killed and many more grievously injured, some crippled for life. The occasion of festivity turned into times of mourning for many families as they lost their near and dear ones in such accidents. The patterns of accidents this year were same as those that happened in previous years. There were head-on-collisions between passenger buses; vehicles had skidded off and fell in roadside ditches; some people met their death hit by tree branches as they rode on roof tops of buses and trains and so on. The gruesome graphics of some of these accidents have been displayed on some television channels. The most annoying aspect of the whole thing is we have not seen any "Highway Patrol" on the highways to control over-speeding buses. We have not seen them near the sites after the accidents to offer help. It is the common people who had gone to the rescue of the victims. We know there is a department by the name of Highway Patrol equipped with high speed cars but we do not know where they perform their duties. Were they not aware that thousands of people would be travelling in vehicles of every description on the highways during this time? If they are not available on the highways in times of need then what is the justification of sporting that title? Accidents on the highways during annual festivals are no new phenomena in this country. As hundreds of passenger buses and private cars begin to ferry people from one end to another, our concerns begin to mount as we watch television reports of people scrambling on the roof tops of buses to embark on a perilous journey. Researchers have already told us why such fatal incidents occur mostly during vacations. Among the many reasons are: old and faulty passenger buses put in service after hasty repair work; over speeding by buses and trucks on the highways to catch the ferry on the river bank or to reach destinations before the other; brake failure at the last moment; negotiating dangerous curves at breakneck speed; young immature drivers given employment during vacations at low salary; drunken driving or driving with serious eye problems; and absence of highway patrol police to deter over speeding. These findings have been presented in numerous seminars and roundtable conferences by experts before the relevant authorities but we wonder whether even ten percent of those recommendations have been implemented in dead earnest. When will they be implemented in full? Or have they been dumped for good? To be candid, the regularity of fatal accidents during Eid and other festivals has somehow made our senses blunt to some extent. Unless we develop greater empathy within us for the travelling people, we shall not understand the pain and plight of those who lose their dear ones in road accidents. In full consideration of the rising number of deaths of people in road accidents globally, World Health Organization (WHO) had declared the theme of World Health Day 2004 as "Road Safety Is No

Swan workers yet to get paid Demonstrations continue

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

Defying rainfall all throughout the day, over 100 workers of Swan Garments (Pvt) Ltd staged a sit-in in front of the capital's Jatiya Press Club for the ninth day yesterday demanding four months' wage arrears and Eid bonus while the government is yet to resolve the issue though the factory closed three months back. "The government and owners remain indifferent even though workers passed Eid day here. It proves that they have no responsibility," said Ruhul Amin, general secretary of Garment Workers' Trade Union Centre, which brought the workers together.

He was addressing a press briefing there. A statement of the union released afterwards said the factory, situated in Mollartek, closed on April 10 without any prior notice, leaving nearly 1,300 workers in uncertainty. "None of the rules relating to closure has been followed. As a result, we are forced to continue our movement," it read, adding that the union had earlier sought the intervention of the government and Bangladesh Garment Manufacturers and Exporters Association. "None have come up so far to relieve the sufferings of workers who are in hardship," said Ruhul. The union accused the government of dilly-dallying over the issue by making promises in the last three months. Early this month, the labour ministry formed a committee headed by the inspector general of the Department of Inspection for Factories and Establishments (DIFE). Labour Secretary Mikail Shipar told The Daily Star that the committee would sit on July 26 to find ways to resolve the issue. He said the company owner died and the successor needed a succession certificate from the court to sell off assets and pay the workers. "It will take time. They (workers) should wait for at least for a month," he said.
