

Beasts of No Nation Gets New Trailer

The West Africa-based war drama "Beasts of No Nation" – starring Idris Elba and directed by Cary Fukunaga – may be this fall's most important release as it will be the first major non-documentary feature film to debut on Netflix the same day it starts a limited theatrical release. Several major theatre chains are boycotting the film, seeing movie releases like this as being a threat. What we've learned about "Beasts of No Nation" from its initial critical reception and its newly-released trailer should make audiences even more excited- and theatre chain executives even more nervous. "Beasts of No Nation" had its world premiere at the 2015 Venice Film Festival and the new trailer makes it clear that it is an intense film, considering that it tells the story of a very young child soldier.

NEW SPECTRE Poster Features Léa Seydoux

There has been widespread speculation about where the latest James Bond movie "Spectre" will take the iconic British spy. The trailer has shown Europe and snowy mountains, but we still don't know exactly where the action will largely be set as the trailer and posters incorporated skeletal Day of the Dead imagery from Mexico. In the most recent official Bond poster, actress Léa Seydoux has been added in – looking impeccable in a floor length silver dress. The actress from acclaimed films like "Blue is the Warmest Colour" and "Grand Budapest Hotel" is the latest addition to the list of Bond Girls. While the quality of Craig-era Bond films have varied, expectations are high for Spectre which is expected to be the last Bond film helmed by director Sam Mendes.
