The story of us

In those evolving times, Monday, January 14 saw the publication of the very first issue of The Daily Star. After the downfall of autocracy, the infectious positive vibe caught upon the young generation and once again it was the dawn of free thinking. The nationalistic verve that shook the foundations of tyranny also fuelled a spark in our urban lives. And the publication of The Daily Star was a direct result of that craving for a revolution.

Thus, three seemingly unrelated entities – our new found political identity, a new born daily and a carefree university graduate, embarked upon a journey - a companionship that has now lasted 25 years.

Celebrating its silver jubilee this year, The Daily Star has moulded the minds of its readers and shaped the way we have perceived freedom of thought in the last two and a half decades. It has been an exhilarating experience to serve the nation through journalism that is 'without fear or favour.'

Although our taste of democracy has been a bittersweet one, the nation has made progress in all frontiers and it is with this positive attitude that The Daily Star has brought the news to the nation's forefront.

From achievements in the field of business to arts and culture, and lifestyle in general, they have presented a positive image of Bangladesh, not only to the people of the country but to the global readers.

Through in-depth news analysis, robust opinion pieces, and sincere journalism, Star prompted the Generation

Z to think for themselves. Like all media should be, The Daily Star, has been the ears and the eyes of our society and our ever changing present.

This has also been the case with Smita and most of her peers - all witnesses to changing times.
