

[Not Purple]
RAIN

Just when you thought you're about to metamorphose into a cactus and Dhaka has become a slightly smaller version of Sahara, it arrived. But not before violently blowing some more dust into your gaping mouths. Yes, rain. Well, no, not just rain, thunderstorm – Kalboishakhi, to be precise. On the 18th day of Boishakh, too.

If you were fortunate to be able to admire it in the safety of your home, I hope you had khichuri for dinner with electricity. If you were outdoor and had to deal with this force of nature, condolences.

It remains to be seen how the rest of the season plays out. If any trait defines Bangladesh, it's the lack of a middle ground – that extends to the weather too. No flood, please. Thank you.

A Simple Way to Track Your Expenses

I'm that person who tends to spend all her money as soon as she gets it, and when I realized last February that I was broke within the first 12 days of the month, I figured it was high time I started keeping a record of how much I was spending on what things. After looking through a bunch of money manager apps, I liked the Moneyfy the best. It has quite a few downsides, like you can't create budgets and it won't let you change the currency unless you buy the full version. But if you're only looking to document your everyday expenses, then this is perfect. You can create multiple accounts, add or subtract the amounts of money you're earning or spending throughout the month, and get an idea of how much you have left to spend at any time.

Moneyfy's design is much better than most of the other money management apps out there. The functions are very simple, and I found it to be very suitable for my personal finance needs. It actually did help me spend a little more wisely, which is why this month I took a whopping 20 days to go broke. I'm hoping I'll get better at this in the future.
