The untold story

that mahajans like him all sit down to buy from individual or smaller weavers, and then sell the purchased products to retailers. Mohammad Abdul Aminsays.

Kuddus, another Jamdani businessman, explains further, "There are times when our own production is not large enough to meet the day's demand, and we end up buying from other weavers to compensate the gap."

According to Al Amin, a middleman can also help with selling Jamdanis without much complication, as they take their cut from beyond whatever they get over the original makers' set price. This way, a weaver gets to sell his products quicker and the middleman gets his cut without depriving producers.

Jamdani is the livelihood for thousands of weavers, and a business cannot be without profits. Amin says profit is shared in a very fair manner, with all associated costs like weavers' salaries, factory costs, vehicle costs and any other business related costs are covered by equal split of the profits among all participants. This way no one feels cheated,

Today, Narayanganj, specifically a village in Rupganj called Rupshi, is a hub of Jamdani weaving and supply. This is where it is loomed, as the Shitalakkhya river is nearby and abundant water is a prerequisite for processing the cotton needed for making Jamdanis.

ibly intricate works and take days or months to create. Each product requires minute attention to detail, all through the weaving process. To the people who weave this Jamdani though, it is a way of life. They are also artists in their own right, spending years to hone their skills, often from one generation to another in the same family.

While it can be considered a bit of an overkill to go all the way to Demra Staff Quarters almost outside the capital, for true enthusiasts there is no better pleasure. This is also where all the Jamdani that one might encounter in shops or malls come from, but with much more affordable choices. The haat can be quite a ruckus as it involves people with various roles, from financiers to weavers to retailers.

Most people who would go to these haats would most likely encounter a Few people are aware that bustling crowd, while being Jamdani products are incred- somewhat oblivious to the underlying workings of the haat.

> With the Eid-ul-Fitr just weeks away, people like Al Amin have a much busier schedule to maintain, but they do get to charge higher prices than usual, since demand is strong due to the festival season, and with the equal profit splitting scheme in effect, it means everyone is just that little bit happier.
