

Lokayan: a museum bringing traditional life alive

QUAMRUL ISLAM RUBAIYAT with TANBIR UDDIN ARMAN

Got fed up finding no new place in your domain or failing to decide where to go during your vacation? When you are engrossed in thinking about your next travel destination, Lokayan museum in Thakurgaon Sadar upazila should come up as a good option.

Typically, the term "museum" refers to places where historical artefacts are preserved, which give ideas about lifestyles and memorabilia of rulers and other renowned personalities of a certain period, but not about the general masses. However, going a bit beyond the conventional definition of a museum, Lokayan tells its visitors of stories about lifestyles and livelihoods of people of all strata living for hundreds of years in the northern part of the country, which has a huge wealth of folk traditions.

Established in 2006 by Eco-Social Development Organisation (Esdo), the museum has already accumulated 3,000 traditional tools and materials of different types used by rural people, for instance, farmer's hat, fishing and hunting equipment, plough, rural attire, palanquin and etc.

It receives a good response from people across the country. Every day around 100-150 visitors throng it, and the number mounts during holidays and vacations, according to the museum authorities.

During a recent visit to the museum, this correspondent saw parents mainly from urban areas taking their children to it with a view to introducing their kids to the items rarely seen in cities.

While visiting around the museum with her daughter, Badrun Nahar Liza, who was from Dhaka Cantonment area, said, "The objects representing the grassroots help us know about our roots."

A mother's hope dashed under waterfall

MINHAJ UDDIN, City

When Namita Dey, 53, lost her husband five years ago, her only son had become her sole resort to overcome grief and a hope in her struggle. With her meagre income as a family welfare assistant of the health directorate's Hathazari upazila office, she afforded his education in engineering.

But all of a sudden, her hope was shattered when her beloved son died after falling from a waterfall in Mirsarai upazila of Chittagong on August 15.

Animesh Dey, 27, son of Niranjan Dey of Poddarpara village in Fatickchhari upazila, who passed his BSC-in-engineering in petroleum and mining from the Shahjalal University of Science and Technology two years ago, was trying to get a scholarship for his master's study from a college in the US, said his family and friends.

"Mother, once I ... complete my higher studies your misery will be over," Animesh's only elder sister Anamika Dey quoted him as saying, adding that by saying this he tried to console their mother very often.

"Since my father's demise in May 2011, my mother had been taking extra care of my brother. He (Animesh) used to roam around different places with friends. Although my mother did not like that, she did not forbid him. She maintained regular communication to know about the update of his stay," she said.

On that fateful day, after leaving his Oxygen area residence, Animesh told her mother over the phone around 11:30am that he was crossing Sitakunda and asked her not to worry.
