The baby was crying uncontrollably. Not because his mother was away or he was hungry. It was the environment he was welcomed into after birth – the cold, open hospital floor.

Omar Khayyam was one of the dozens of new-borns suffering from the same condition.

Sher-e-Bangla Medical College Hospital, Barisal where they were born does not have enough space to give them a warm welcome, into the comfort and softness of clean beds.

"I am afraid of my child's safety at the place because people are always walking past my bed and kicking up dust," said Neela, a new mother, from Madaripur sadar upazila. "I wrap my son with cloth and have to change it every half an hour to protect him from dust."

Her attendant, Rashida, said, "We can't clean the clothes of the baby and mother for the shortage of bathrooms. We are also suffering because there is no toilet close by."

Recognising the problems, head of the gynaecological department Shikha Saha said, "We conduct 20 to 25 operations in the ward a day but the air conditioner of the operation theatre is not functioning properly."

"All the problems arise from the bed crisis at the unit," said Dr SM Sirajul Islam, the hospital's director. "I can manage beds but there is not enough room inside the ward to set them up." "Can we think how inhumane it is to treat patients on the floor? But I can't do anything," he said. "I feel bad that a child has to be kept on the floor outside the room as soon as it is born; the new-borns have to face an unclean environment from birth."

He said, "New-borns should be kept in a clean place, free from dust and germs; otherwise they might get various diseases... If they stay in the open place for a long time, they might catch a cold."

"I contacted the higher authorities repeatedly for increasing the facilities, but to no avail."
