CURBING MILITANCY

Political will, reform in education sought

STAFF CORRESPONDENT

A reform in the education system and political will and a socio-cultural movement can help youths choose the right path, speakers told a discussion yesterday.

They said youths should also be engaged in social dialogues so that policymakers can listen to them in order to eliminate the menace of militancy.

Sammilito Samajik Andolon and Bangladesh Rukhe Darao organised the discussion on "Militant Activities in Bangladesh: Basic Things to Do" at Dhaka Reporters' Unity in the capital.

Discussants said although the government has its initiative, a promised national consensus against militancy is yet to be formed.

Dr Sarwar Ali, a trustee of the Liberation War Museum (LWM), said although political failure has been blamed widely, problem of militancy is deeply rooted in the society.

Present-day Bangladesh is different from what it was during the Liberation War while the global scenario has also changed by this time, he said. "If we cannot understand this, we won't be able to reach our goal."

Reading out the keynote paper, economist Prof MM Akash said there would be an end to the stigma of militancy if its financing source can be disconnected. "For this, first we have to identify its economic basis."

Prof Nur Mohammad Talukder, member secretary of Platform against Communism and Militancy, said political leaders while assuming power had patronised Qawmi education. But they did not take enough measures to modernise its education system.

Cultural personality Ramendu Majumdar said cultural activists were vocal against changes in textbooks but the government kept mum, which surprised the countrymen. Educational institutions can play an important role in curbing militancy.

LWM Trustee Ziauddin Tariq Ali presided over the discussion. Historian Prof Syed Anwar Hossain, left-leaning politician Pankaj Bhattacharya, rights activist Rokeya Kabir and Dhaka University teacher Robayet Ferdous also spoke.

Waterlogging a never-ending crisis in Khulna city

DIPANKAR ROY, Khulna

Due to unabated encroachment of canals and a lack of proper drainage and sewerage system in Khulna city, waterlogging has become a perennial problem for the dwellers, especially in the rainy season.

For the residents, rain is neither a blessing nor it brings any respite. It rather begets waterlogging, overflowing of drains and inundation of most of the roads, shops and houses.

According to them, due to a poor drainage system, rainwater mixed with sewage continues to escalate sufferings of around 1.7 million people living in 45.65 sq km area under 31 wards in the riverine divisional city.

Even after a light rain, areas such as Dak Bangla Mor, Picture Palace

Crossing, Shibbari Intersection, Old Jessor Road, Clay Road, KD Ghosh Road, Cemetery Road, Sir Iqbal Road, Moylapota Mor, Gallamari Mor, Rupsha Ghat, BL College Mor, Phulbari Gate, Sonadanga Central Bus Stand Intersection, PTI Mor, Royal Mor and Shantidham Mor go under knee-to-waist-deep water.

Nasim Ahmed, a resident of Sir Iqbal Road area, said, "Anytime it rains, water gets inside our house. We cannot even use the kitchen or bathroom."

"The streets also stay inundated. We have to wade through filthy water mixed with sewage," said a frustrated Nasim.

Idris Miah, a rickshaw-puller of Rupsha area, said, "We don't usually pull rickshaws amid rain. Even vehicles try to stay off the roads."

Sheikh Ashraf Tutul, a shopkeeper on Mirzapur Road, said, "Water also enters the shops damaging our goods. Many of us do not open our businesses during rain."

Many of the locals said most of the city drains are clogged with polythene, plastic bottles and household garbage. They are not properly cleaned by the authorities concerned, alleged locals.

According to the Khulna City Corporation (KCC) sources, the KCC has spent over Tk 150 crore for excavation and re-excavation of the canals and improving the drainage system.

But due to unabated encroachment by the influential locals and incessant dumping of waste, most of the city's 47 canals do not flow properly and the waterlogging crisis remains at large, they added.

"Due to inclement weather, we cannot dare to go to the deep sea," he further said.

Moslem Mia, another fisherman, said he had to return with only 10 maunds within 10 days, although he had caught over 50 maunds last year.
