Date palm shows hope

First Middle Eastern date palms planted in Barisal in hope of new agricultural industry

SUSHANTA GHOSH with ANDREW EAGLE

Cultivated in the Bengal region since time immemorial, the native sugar date palm, locally called 'khejurer gachh', is well-appreciated, primarily for its syrup. Now, for the first time in southern Bangladesh government horticulturalists are trialling a number of Middle Eastern date palm varieties, of the distinct species renowned for its well-known fruit. If the trial plantation proves successful, it is hoped that date production can be a new agricultural industry for the region.

Dates have been a staple food in the Middle East and Indus Valley for many thousands of years. The fruit of the date palm, a tree which may originally be native to modern-day Iraq, have featured on the plates of diners since ancient times, admired for their sweetness in Ancient Egypt and Mesopotamia. Nowadays the tree is widely cultivated throughout the Middle East, North Africa, and in tropical and subtropical regions worldwide.

The horticulture centre in Barisal's Babuganj upazila is attempting to add southern Bangladesh to the world's date-producing regions. "We have planted 73 date palms of eleven varieties thus far, in what is a first for the country's south," says the centre's deputy director Swapon Kumar Halder. "If we succeed in producing quality dates, we plan to encourage a local industry. Potentially, thousands of farmers will benefit."

Leaving a legacy of success

Pranab to quit as Indian president Monday

PALLAB BHATTACHARYA, New Delhi

As Pranab Mukherjee, the first Bengali president of India, readies to step down on Monday after his five-year tenure, he leaves behind the legacy of a copybook head of state who strived hard to bring the presidential palace closer to the public.

After he was elected in July 2012, he had told journalists the constitution simply does not provide for an "active" or "passive" or "activist president".

Dozens wounded after Israel bars worshippers aged under 50 from entering the holy site for Friday prayer

AFP, Jerusalem

Three Palestinians were killed and dozens wounded yesterday as clashes erupted between protesters and Israeli forces over new security measures at an ultra-sensitive Jerusalem holy site where police restricted access for Muslim prayers.

One Palestinian was shot dead by Israeli gunfire in the A-Tur neighbourhood of east Jerusalem, according to the Palestinian health ministry.

A second Palestinian was killed by gunfire in east Jerusalem's Ras al-Amud neighbourhood, while a third was shot dead in Abu Dis in the occupied West Bank, the ministry said, without providing details on the circumstances.

Israel's army confirmed it was involved in clashes in Abu Dis.

The unrest came after Israeli ministers decided not to order the removal of metal detectors erected at entrances to the Haram al-Sharif compound, known to Jews as the Temple Mount, following an attack nearby a week ago that killed two policemen. The compound contains the revered Al-Aqsa mosque.

In anticipation of protests, Israeli police yesterday barred men under 50 from entering Jerusalem's Old City for prayers, while all women were allowed in.

Police said later in the day that discretion could be applied in the use of the metal detectors instead of forcing everyone to go through them.

But Palestinian and religious leaders were still calling on worshippers not to enter until they were removed.

Hundreds held midday prayers near the gates of the Old City in protest. According to police, dozens of people entered the compound.

Crowds gathered outside Jerusalem's Old City found shops closed and streets around Damascus Gate -- the entrance most heavily used by Palestinians -- blocked.

A group of several hundred people, including Muslim leaders, marched towards the Lions Gate entrance to the mosque compound, but police informed them that only men aged 50 or over would be allowed in.

Police later fired stun grenades and tear

INCLUSIVE POLLS UK to engage with all parties of Bangladesh

Sees no improvement in HR situation

UNB, Dhaka

The UK has said it will "engage constructively" with all Bangladeshi political parties and their international partners to strengthen democratic accountability and capacity to hold participatory elections.

The British Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) stated this in the Bangladesh section of its Human Rights and Democracy Report on the situation in 2016.

The formation of the Election Commission provides a vital opportunity to build confidence that the political process can be free and fair, said the report published on Thursday.

"There was no improvement in the overall human rights situation in Bangladesh during 2016."

Robo-footballers go for world champs

AFP, Sydney

A roar rings out as a small, white robot wins a tussle for the ball and kicks it into the goal.

Australia's roboters yesterday put their bipedal humanoids through their paces ahead of the world championships in Japan next week with one task in mind -- to claim the RoboCup trophy for a record sixth time.

The contest is celebrating its 20th anniversary this year, with the two key contenders from Australia and Germany, who have both won five championships each.

An even bigger goal looms ahead in 2050 with roboticists hoping to advance their development of artificial intelligence to the point where they can take on and beat the human World Cup champions.

"Every team has exactly the same robot, and it's all about who can come up with the best software to
