Solar costs to fall further: Irena

REUTERS, Singapore
Solar power costs will fall by another 60 percent over the next decade giving an already booming market another boost, the head of the International Renewable Energy Agency (Irena) said on Monday.
Solar power is in the midst of boom because of sharp drops in costs and efficiency improvements, pushing global capacity from virtually zero at the start of the century to 300 gigawatt (GW) by the end of 2016, a figure expected to rise again by 2020.

Irena expects 80 to 90 GW of new solar capacity, enough to power more than 8 billion LED light bulbs, to be added globally each year over the next 5 to 6 years, Adnan Amin, the director general of Irena told Reuters, exceeding a forecast of 73 GW from the International Energy Agency (IEA).
"This could easily accelerate as costs decline in the future," said Amin. "China alone can do 50 GW a year."
"In the next decade, the cost of (utility scale) solar could fall by 60 percent or more," he said in Singapore on Monday. That growth will mark

China as the world's biggest and fastest growing solar market as Beijing relies on renewable power to cut air pollution from coal-fired power plants.
While Amin said that India would also see sharp solar growth in coming years, he expected Southeast Asia to be more mixed.
"There is a target of 23 percent (power generation) in Asean for renewables by 2025. We think it's ambitious but it's achievable." The solar power share of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations' (Asean) 10 members is currently negligible.

London Mayor joins business demands for Brexit transition deal

REUTERS, London
London Mayor Sadiq Khan joined Britain's business leaders in warning that companies would start moving jobs and investment out of the country if they do not get a transition deal soon, saying businesses were not bluffing with their concerns.
The boss of Goldman Sachs tweeted last week that he was looking forward to spending more time in Frankfurt after Brexit, and Britain's five leading business organizations warned on Monday that the threat to the economy was becoming critical.
"Just left Frankfurt. Great meetings, great weather, really enjoyed it. Good, because I'll be spending a lot more time there. #Brexit," CEO Lloyd Blankfein tweeted last Thursday. Khan, a member of the opposition Labour Party, said Blankfein's comment reflected a wider thinking in the business community and warned that others would follow suit if a transition deal was not quickly agreed with Brussels.
"He's articulating publicly what many CEOs and investors who love working in London have been saying privately, which is that unless they have certainty about what happens after March 29, 2019, they have got to make a plan B," he said. "He's not bluffing. When I speak to businesses each day, they're not bluffing."
Prime Minister Theresa May has promised to retain full access to the EU's single market for two years after Brexit to limit the disruption for companies who do not know how they will trade with their neighbours in the future.

However, leading Brexit campaigners have started to call on May to walk out of the talks if Brussels does not agree quickly to move on to discuss Britain's future trading relationship, weighing on sterling and spooking businesses.
May won a brief respite on Friday when EU leaders signalled they were ready to move the negotiations forward in the coming months.
With tensions mounting, the five business groups which speak on behalf of companies employing millions of workers, have drawn up a letter to Brexit minister David Davis, warning that time is running out for companies which need to make investment decisions at the beginning of next year.

Toshiba sees annual loss of almost $1b

REUTERS, Tokyo
Embattled Japanese conglomerate Toshiba Corp said on Monday it now expects to slide to a net loss of nearly $1 billion this business year after calculating taxes related to the sale of its prized chip unit.
Toshiba, which separated out the unit in April as a prelude to a sale, said it was being taxed on the basis of assets and liabilities of the transferred business at the time of the split.
The latest forecasts, however, do not reflect expected gains from the 2 trillion yen ($17.6 billion) sale as the deal has yet to receive regulatory approval.
Toshiba said that due to the tax impact, it expects a loss of 110 billion yen ($970 million) in the year to March, instead of its previously forecast profit of 230 billion yen. It kept its annual revenue and other profit forecasts unchanged.
Toshiba, desperate for funds to cover liabilities arising from its U.S. nuclear unit Westinghouse, agreed last month to sell the unit - the world's second biggest producer of NAND flash memory chips - to a group led by Bain Capital.
A highly contentious auction meant that a decision on the buyer took much longer than expected, and Toshiba has run the risk of not getting anti-trust clearance before the end of the financial year in March as regulatory reviews usually take at least six months.
If it doesn't get the deal done in time, it could end the year in negative net worth for a second year in a row, putting pressure on the Tokyo Stock Exchange to delist it.
