Base policies on credible data

Economists say

STAR BUSINESS REPORT

Policies framed with the support of evidence and credible data benefit the economy and the society as a whole, economists said yesterday.

They also said decisions taken on populist notions and prescriptions from donors may not bring desired results.

The views were shared at the launch of a book—Evidence based policy making in Bangladesh—penned by Sadiq Ahmed, vice-chairman of the Policy Research Institute of Bangladesh.

The book highlights the importance of research and evidence-based policymaking.

If policies are formulated in the framework of informed decision making, they are more likely to work than those that are purely politically motivated with insufficient evidence or analysis, Ahmed said at the event.

"In our experience, we have found that government has limited analytical capacity," he said, adding that the government addressed the issue in recent years by partnering with think-tanks.

Some efforts are also underway to develop in-house evidence-based policymaking capacity in key line ministries in coordination with the cabinet division.
