

Not your circus,
not your monkey

I don't believe in New Year's resolutions. At best, they're probably half of January resolutions. But I do believe in and strongly endorse self-improvement. In that spirit, I earnestly hope that we, as a nation, are more tolerant and less judgy in 2018 and the following years. Why do we care SO MUCH about what people do/don't/eat/don't eat/wear/don't wear when it has zero impact on us and our lives? Why are we offended by so many things so frequently? Can a brother/sister live? Live and let live. Focus on your circus, feed your own monkey.

— Karim Waheed, cautiously optimistic about 2018

Unless you're a really lucky person, you probably had to work on a group project at some point in your life. Has there been a time when you thought you distributed the tasks perfectly only to realise that one particular task was not assigned to anyone and you happen to notice this just before the submission? If yes, then Trello is here to save you from all the hassle.

Trello, a project collaboration app launched in 2011, makes tracking of allocated work easy as well as fun. The app is fairly easy to use once you get the hang of it, but to walk you through the learning process, it comes with a how-to guide. In Trello, you get to create boards that consist of lists, and lists that consist of cards where you get to add comments, make checklists, upload attachments and set deadlines. It has cool features like mentioning members and dragging finished task in the "Done" list. You get to add as many teammates, boards, or cards as you want for free. The design is very basic and not suitable for complex projects since it doesn't have a time-tracking tool.

The premium features entail attaching bigger files, unlimited powerups using different apps, getting to add custom board background as well as ensuring the privacy settings of boards. So, the next time you're banging your head trying to assign the responsibilities, you know what to use.
