EDITOR'S NOTE

Our present is tomorrow's past and perception of today's realities serve as the foundation for the future. In the 27-year-old journey of The Daily Star, we have attempted to review the past and chronicle how it contributes to the shaping of our current lives and ethos. On a note of sheer optimism, we always leave the future to take its due course based on our collective experience. This year's fifth and final instalment of The Daily Star's 27th Anniversary Supplement therefore zeroes in on life-style issues that are trending now and are at the top of our minds unhindered by the many demands of our daily lives and struggles in 2018. Neatly boxed together into three segments that we feel are the staples of modern life, we start off with our take on the phenomena we call lifestyle and fashion. Ever changing and fluid in itself over time, yet a persistently constant part of whatever shape our present may take at any given point in time. We move on with gastronomy, and how food defines our culture, and often forms the basis of how we become the people that we are; the memories, interests, and the feeling of home that just the aroma of a dish can evoke. And finally, we wind up with a prediction of what the future may hold for us.

The segments, true to its nature, come combined with three video stories especially to pique the youth's interest. Yet, as we constantly encounter new ideas, views and stances, our lives will continue to change, even more so as we adapt to the increasingly metropolitan elements that are constantly seeping into the ethos of life. Thus, we conclude with a look at life as it is today; a reminiscent trip into elements that have defined our present and the binding connections of art and music in collective memory.

The Daily Star hopes to be part of that change, keep up with all that is young in its move forward, towards a bigger, brighter future.
